The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 98 of the bill, all after the word "eighty-three," in line 35, down to and including line 40, was stricken out and there was inserted after the word "eighty-three," in line 35, "ten thousand seven hundred and thirty-five dollars and fifty-three cents: Provided, That the said corporations, respectively, shall give satisfactory security to the Secretary of the Treasury that the said amounts shall be paid to the several alien bondholders or stockholders, or their representatives out of whose money the said corporations paid the said taxes.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment; and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURNES. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 79.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it takes a quorum to repudiate the debt in this House.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BURNES, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 92.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 110, line 42 of the amendment, strike out "fifty-two hundred and forty-five," and change the amount in lines 43 and 44, making it "$59,405.81."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the original proposition be read, and then the amendment, so that it may be clearly understood.

The Clerk read as follows:

The original proposition as contained in the bill is:

"For the payment of the claims on account of transportation of the Army and its supplies certified as due by the Second Comptroller in Schedule A, pages 21 and 22 of said Executive Document No. 210, except the claims numbered 4377, 5245, and 1308 enumerated therein, $48,655.81."

The amendment is to substitute the following:

"For payment of the claims on account of transportation of the Army and its supplies certified as due by the Second Comptroller in Schedule A, pages 21 and 22 of said Executive Document No. 210, except the claims numbered 4377 and 1308 enumerated therein, $59,405.81."

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIN. Would it be in order to state at this time that this payment has been recommended by the Comptroller and by his predecessor?

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate, and debate is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been rejected, however, by the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. CRAIN. Only on the ground that its payment was prohibited by law.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment; and there were—ayes 40, noes 53.

Mr. CRAIN. I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. CRAIN and Mr. HOLMAN to act as tellers.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to inquire whether this claim has been recommended by any officer of the Government?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question. That is a matter for debate on the floor.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 60.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be much misunderstanding as to the character of this amendment, and I rise to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] be allowed five minutes to explain the matter, a like time being allowed to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in reply.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 9798) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, the claim of Mr. League is one which is set up on a contract between him and the legally authorized representative of the United States Government in December, 1865, for the rent and occupation of a wharf, warehouse, and coal-yard in the city of Galveston, Tex. Prior to the period for which this amendment proposes to make payment the Government under that contract had paid for several months the actual rent per month claimed in this amendment; and subsequently the Government again paid the same rent for the use and occupation of this property, thereby ratifying the contract which had been made. The vouchers in support of the claim were filed about fifteen years ago in the Treasury Department. The quartermaster at Galveston certified to the correctness of this account; the quartermaster-general of the department of Texas ratified the account; but it was rejected by the Quartermaster-General of the United States, General Meigs, upon the ground that its payment was prohibited by the law of 1864 and the supplemental act of 1867, which provided that no claim originating in an insurrectionary State during the war should be paid. In the case of Rawlings vs. The United States, Attorney-General Evarts, in reply to a communication from General Schofield, Secretary of War, gave it as his opinion that the acts of 1864 and 1867, upon which General Meigs based his failure to recommend the payment of this claim, did not apply to cases which originated in insurrectionary States during the war if founded on contract. Subsequently, in the case of Green vs. The United States, The Court of Claims expressed the same view of the law, and said that notwithstanding these laws prohibiting the payment of claims which originated in the insurrectionary States, such claims when founded on contract between the Government and the individual should be paid, and that in such cases the laws of 1864 and 1867 were not applicable. In deciding this case the Court of Claims referred expressly to the opinion of the Attorney-General in the case of Rawlings.

The only objection which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] can have to this amendment must be based on the ground that the claim has been rejected by the Quartermaster-General of the Army; but when you analyze the reasons which actuated him in refusing to recommend the claim you find opposed to them the opinion of the Attorney-General, supplemented by a decision of the Court of Claims upon similar cases.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman two questions.

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. First, is there any claim that the charge made in this case for the use of this property was excessive?

Mr. CRAIN. None whatever.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If I understand the matter correctly, this claim arose subsequently to the cessation of hostilities, but before the formal proclamation of peace was issued by President Johnson in August, 1866.

Mr. CRAIN. That is correct.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. One further question: Were these accounts certified and allowed by the Treasury Department?

Mr. CRAIN. These accounts were in the first place certified as correct by the officer who made the contract; second, they were ratified by the quartermaster in charge of the Department of Texas; third, they were certified as correct by the Second Comptroller under a former administration, were sent back by the Committee on Appropriations, and were again certified as correct by the Second Comptroller now in office.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then the only objection to their payment, as I understand, is that the letter of the law precluded the allowance of the claim by the Quartermaster-General, as he construed the law.

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir; as he construed it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is, the acts of 1864 and 1867?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. CRAIN. Ten thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] is substantially correct, as I understand the case. The claim was rejected by General Meigs, Quartermaster-General, on the ground that the payment of this class of claims was expressly prohibited by the act of 1864 as amended by the act of 1867. It has been held, I think quite uniformly, that where a contract was made by a subordinate quartermaster and had been ratified by the Quartermaster-General the effect was to take the claim out of the operation of the act of 1867. But it does not appear that this claim was ever approved by the Quartermaster-General's Department. There was simply a contract by a subordinate quartermaster in the field. The claim stands on the same footing as a large number of other claims, the payment of which is prohibited by the act of 1864 as amended by the act of 1867. This claim, so far as I am aware, has never been considered by a committee of the House, or if so considered has never been reported on by a committee; so that the exact facts, so far as we are concerned, are only known to the extent I state—that the claim was rejected by the Quartermaster-General because its payment was prohibited by law.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will in one moment. This is a claim, as I understand, for $2,500 a month for rent of a wharf, warehouse, and coal-yard in the city of Galveston. The claim amounts, I believe, to $10,950.

Mr. CRAIN. Ten thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much per month?

Mr. HOLMAN. Twenty-five hundred dollars per month.

Mr. OATES. Does the gentleman know for what purpose this property was used by the Government?

Mr. HOLMAN. It was not stated to what use the property was applied. The House, of course, understands that the act of 1867 did not operate as to claims originating after the 20th of August, 1866.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield for a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. In a moment. Had the claim accrued after the 20th of August, 1866, of course it would not be affected by the act of 1867. There was a proclamation of the President, decided by the Supreme Court to be the final determination of the war. Among the claims affected by the act of 1864 as amended by the act of 1867 this claim is included.

Mr. BAYNE. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say there is a very large body of claims of this character?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; there are other claims.

Mr. BAYNE. Have there been other claims referred to the Committee on Appropriations similar to this?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not say as to that. The committee has not examined these claims.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the committee made examination as to the right of the officers of the Treasury to inquire into claims of this character?

Mr. HOLMAN. That has not been examined into.

Mr. BLOUNT. Have they not done it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not say. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CRAIN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. CRAIN. I understand that.

Mr. CANNON. How much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. One minute and a half.

Mr. CANNON. In that minute and a half, Mr. Speaker, I can only say it occurs to me there may be some question about this claim. At best it is but a claim. But considering the precedent set by the House a few moments ago, that it is proper for a majority of this House to repudiate debts affirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court, I am curious to see how gentlemen on that side who were swift to repudiate its debts will vote on a claim of doubtful propriety.

Mr. SPRINGER. As this is an ordinary war claim, it should be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired. The question recurs on the amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 95, not voting 110; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. PHELPS, until further notice.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. LOUTTIT, for the rest of the day.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, on this vote.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. HAYDEN, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CRAIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I sent to the desk.

The SPEAKER. It will be read, subject to objection.

After line 1712, page 70 of the bill, insert:

"For payment to John C. Barr, for forty-two days' services as clerk to the special committee investigating certain telephone matters, $252."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire now if I am entitled to my hour?

The SPEAKER. Unless the previous question is ordered the bill is debatable as any other proposition. The previous question heretofore ordered has been exhausted, and the gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNES. I simply desire, sir, to say that with my view as to some of the amendments incorporated upon the bill it will be impossible for me to vote for it. I yield to my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. BURNES. As much as he may desire.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall not occupy more than ten minutes.

Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the amendment voting a month's compensation for the annual and session employés of the House we proceeded upon the presumption that it would cost, so far as the House was concerned, from thirty-five to forty thousand dollars. It was suggested on the floor that the previous month's compensation had been about $37,000. The Clerk of the House furnished a statement, which was put into the RECORD on the 6th day of July, I believe, showing that the amount of compensation paid on the roll of this House for April—he was not prepared to make a later statement—was $33,615.54; but, as he subsequently informed me, that did not embrace the appropriation for the seven reporters of the House, one of whom gets $6,000, four of them $5,000, and two of them $4,000, making $34,500 additional. Nor did he embrace, as he informs me, the compensation of twenty-six members of the Capitol police, which amounts to $28,300 more, making a total addition of $62,800 to the thirty-three thousand six hundred and odd dollars reported by the Clerk; which shows that the House amendment for this gratuity to these employés carried by this bill will involve an expenditure of nearly $100,000, or quite that sum. It will involve certainly that much, and it may be much more. According to the estimates which we have received it will most likely exceed that.

This item whenever allowed heretofore has always been about doubled when it went to the Senate—some gentleman informs me more than doubled; so that the amendment is calculated in the end to carry an appropriation of about $200,000, an amount which is extorted from the tax-payers of this country and given as a pure gratuity to those receiving high compensation already, many of whom are paid annual salaries for two years and perform only ten months' service. I repeat that they are paid in full for two years at a large annual salary and perform but about ten months' service, and yet this additional gratuity is proposed to be put into the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to know what difference there is in principle between this amendment and the principle of the joint resolution that you introduced yourself paying to the relatives of a deceased officer of this House an entire year's pay, when it was well known that that officer had no wife, no child, no mother, and no family, no one, indeed, except a noted lobbyist that infests the corridors of this Capitol?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Iowa with his usual logic proposes to criticise the accuracy of my position now by showing that, as he supposes, I was wrong on another occasion. That is about as good logic as could be expected from a gentleman occupying the position he occupies on this question. But in doing this I suppose the gentleman is aware of the fact that I followed simply the unbroken line of precedents in that direction. I was asked to introduce that resolution and stated at the time I introduced it by request, and that was all I had to do with it. I was willing to do it, however, because of the relations of the most friendly character, personal and official, which existed between the person for the benefit of whose estate the resolution was offered and myself. At the time I introduced that resolution the venerable mother, and the brother—both since dead—were alive. I do not wish, however, to be called away to discuss the propriety of that resolution. That is past.

I wish to call the attention of this House, and I wish I had the power to call the attention of the American people, to the fact that we propose here to take from the tax-payers of the country their hard earnings and give them to those who are better off than many of them and who are receiving much higher pay than those discharging similar duties in private life. We have thirty or forty pages to whom we pay a salary of $90 a month. Each of us in our district at home can employ six good, able-bodied men for that time for $90. Yet we must give them an additional compensation, an additional month's salary. We must give that to gentlemen who are working ten months for two years' pay at high salaries. We give these gentlemen from $6,000 down to $800 or $900; $6,000, $5,000, $4,500, $4,000, $3,000, and all the way down to $800 or $900. All of these receive better pay than they get elsewhere. And we are to give them this additional compensation with no obligation on our part whatever, but merely a wish to benefit our friends here at the expense of those we represent at home; because they are here with the power and will to importune and badger members to get what does not belong to them by law and what ought not to be given them.

Mr. Speaker, a looker-on at the proceedings of this House might well inquire into many things that have occurred here this session. There are three hundred and twenty-five members here. Many of them are representatives of all kinds of jobs that can come up. They are advocates of every description of expenditure that can be imagined instead of being representatives of the toilers and tax-payers at home. When we go home to our constituents for their votes then we talk of representing them, and many of the very gentlemen who have voted for this bill will be the first to denounce the policy on which it was based. They will not dare to avow that they supported it, as they have not dared to do on this floor, by allowing the yeas and nays to be called so as to show the record of votes by which this infamy was adopted. But I trust yet before we are done with this bill an opportunity will be presented to have the yeas and nays called and to put gentlemen on the record who are willing to vote away from the hard earnings of the tax-payers, the people at home, the voters, $200,000 to overpay men who have agreed to receive the compensation provided by law for their services.

The whole system is vicious; it is vile; it is an encouragement to maraud and to plunder the Treasury by those who have the ear of the lawmakers. It has got to be rebuked, and I trust the action of this House will rebuke it.

I yield the floor back to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BURNES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE].

Mr. PRICE. In a very few moments I propose to call the attention of the House to a few of the objectionable features in this bill as it seems to me, and which seeming so to me will guide my vote on the passage of it.

Since I have learned I would have an opportunity of calling the attention of the House to them at all I have had no opportunity to analyze the bill so as to point out hastily and clearly the objectionable features. The old copy of the bill on which I had my objections marked some evil-disposed person or persons have abstracted, and I have had to supply myself with a new bill. Looking at page 10 of the bill, the first thing I will call attention to is an item of five thousand five hundred and odd dollars for draping public buildings in mourning on the death of a distinguished citizen. Immediately below that item is another of five thousand two hundred and odd dollars for a similar service on the death of another distinguished citizen. You, my Democratic friends, and we, my Republican friends, went before the people in town caucuses, county conventions, State and national conventions, and told the people we believed in wise economy in the distribution of the public revenues. I was in earnest in doing so. I meant it then and I mean it yet. I do not know how a man could have made that promise conscientiously and can now intelligently vote for many of the provisions in this bill aggregating nearly two out of the six millions of dollars that are carried in it.

What do you mean by economy, or what ought you to mean by it? You ought to mean paying for every service rendered to this Government, for everything by which the people are benefited, a square, honest consideration in proportion to the service. How are you going to ascertain that? Not by making a comparison with the compensation paid, the remuneration awarded in other countries, under other forms of government unlike ours. It is to be determined by the compensation that men of this kind could obtain in other avocations in life. Compare the prices you pay with the income of the men who create the wealth that pays the taxes that we are now legislating away. These are the standards that should guide us in coming to a conclusion, and I think I can safely assume that no man on this floor will deny that the employés of this House and all the employés in and around this Capitol could not in any other walk in life secure the same remuneration that we are now paying them, or even 50 per cent. of it. Compare their compensation with what men all over this country, the men who turn the wheels of industry and who control the creative industries of our country, receive, and you will find that what you pay here is infinitely in excess of what they receive, as well as infinitely in excess of the compensation that this kind of talent or service commands in the labor markets of the world.

Then what is the sense of our paying these prices? I say to you, gentlemen, and I challenge contradiction, that the compensation paid to the employés of the two Houses of Congress is largely in excess of what the same kind of service commands in private employments, and the effect is demoralizing to the community, and must strike coldly on the hearts of the people throughout the country who are laboring more hours a day for less compensation.

Therefore this system is not economical, and therefore it is not honest, because we have promised different things. We go into our State and national and county conventions, and we "gush" about what we are going to do, and then some of us come right in here and, when any proposition of this kind is presented we say, "Well, I will vote for this thing; Jones is a clever fellow," or "Smith voted for something for me and I will help him."

So men follow each other like sheep. Great God! gentlemen, will you never learn that every man ought to whittle out his own conclusions on questions of this kind, ought to square them by the proper standards, and then should vote his convictions, and those convictions should be in accordance with the promises that he made to the people as a condition precedent to his obtaining a seat in this House at all?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield me five minutes more time.

Mr. BURNES. It is impossible at this time.

Mr. PRICE. Very well; if it is impossible, then I can not have an opportunity to fully develop this argument.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct a mistake into which I fell in the statement which I submitted to the House a while ago. In speaking of the extra month's pay for the Capitol police and for the Official Reporters of the House I made the mistake of adding the whole amount of their annual pay. Instead of the whole pay I should have added one-twelfth of it, which would make the appropriation about $40,000 instead of $100,000.

Mr. BURNES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL].

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter my protest against the payment of a gratuity to the employés of this House. It is not a very pleasant thing to be put into antagonism with gentlemen with whom we are so constantly associated, but we owe a certain duty to ourselves and to the people whom we represent upon this floor, and that is to exercise the trust that has been reposed in us in an economical, honest, and upright manner. There can be no principle under the sun under which we can be justified in giving a gratuity to these employés any more than we would be justified in voting a gratuity to anybody else who happens to be a citizen of the United States. The principle upon which these men are employed and paid is this: they know in advance exactly what their compensation is to be; they come here not only willingly, but anxiously and persistently, seeking these positions, and they take them with a full understanding of what compensation they are to receive for the service they render. Therefore I say it is wrong in them to ask and it is still worse in us to grant this gratuity. We might as well vote to ourselves an extra month's compensation for the work that we do here. We have as much right to vote an additional month's salary for ourselves as we have to vote it for any other officers or employés in the service of the Government, but in view of the record which the history of this country presents of the "salary-grab" of some years ago there is not a man upon this floor who would dare to cast a vote giving himself one dollar of extra pay. Such an act is wrong in principle, and it would be manifest destruction to any man who would undertake it.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly how much this proposition is to cost us; but the question is not so much one of amount as of principle and precedent. If we give these employés more than they are entitled to we ought to give it to them as a gratuity out of our own pockets, and not undertake to be liberal and generous at the expense of other people whose money has been intrusted to us only for specific purposes.

There are many features in this bill which would make me desire to vote for it, and I think I shall have to do so; but I do object most strenuously to giving away money for which no service has been rendered to the Government. While I oppose this feature of the bill, there is another to which I desire to refer and which I strongly favor—the provision limiting the compensation of United States commissioners to $800. This provision, it seems to me, is worth more to us than anything which can be done in regard to paying certain officers an extra gratuity for work they have not performed. I have had some reason to investigate the charges which these commissioners have made, and I have ascertained that some of these commissioners, who are nothing more nor less than committing magistrates, have taken from the Treasury of the United States as much as $4,000, others as much as $6,000, for doing a work which any man would be willing to do for $500 a year. I am therefore in favor of that feature of the bill which limits their compensation to $800. Taking the whole bill together, I think it is a good one; but I repeat there are some features in it which are objectionable, and particularly the provision by which we propose to give away to officials of the Government other people's money for work that has not been and never will be performed.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I see that my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] wants five minutes more, and I will yield him that time.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to say a few days ago that the incidental expenses of the two Houses of Congress during the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress were $1,030,000, not taking into account the pay and mileage of members. Those expenses are mainly for employés; and dividing that by twelve you have the sum of $86,000, which goes into this bill under the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. That amount may not be exactly correct; but I make the assertion that about $70,000 at least will be the amount absolutely thrown away under that amendment, for not a dollar of value will be rendered for the money thus paid out. Yet that amendment is in the bill; and a sickly sentimentality and bad precedents which have grown up through the action of weak men for years are the only apology for the adoption of that amendment.

We have also in this bill the provision to pay some woman $1,000, because of a contest which her deceased husband had for a seat in the Forty-sixth Congress. There is also in the bill an allowance of $250 for stationery of a member of the last Congress who served less than eleven minutes, and who received for that service $11,000.

The bill is marred and scarred all over with frauds upon the revenue—appropriations voted without thought or without conscience. There is the appropriation of $30,000 or $40,000 as pay of members of Congress who never earned a dollar of it; and in that case there is nothing to justify the payment except bad precedents.

In the name of common sense were we sent here simply to follow a groove marked out by other men without thought or without conscience? Must we, perforce, follow in that groove? Was it not reasonable to suppose when we were sent here that we would weigh each transaction by its own surroundings, voting a million dollars where necessary, and not one cent where unnecessary?

I want to say to my Republican friends here to-day that one of the potent causes which has sent the balance of power to the other side of this Hall is that we have not guarded the revenues of the Government; that in years gone by we have not done as we have invariably agreed to do in the platforms upon which we went before the people. I ask this Congress to rise above all extrinsic considerations in this matter and not to vote for this bill because its passage is asked by a clever and genial gentleman for whom we all have great personal respect. Let us say, "We will vote the revenues of the country wherever necessary, wherever the money has been earned; but where no consideration is rendered we will not vote a cent, whatever may be the precedents."

Another item of the bill which I might mention is the amendment adopted a few moments ago upon motion of our genial friend from Texas, [Mr. CRAIN]. Why, sir, the only way for that measure to approach Congress was through such a committee as we have established under our rules to investigate such cases, examine the evidence, weigh the circumstances, and recommend action to the House with the reasons for such action. The matter should not have come here except through the Committee on Claims; yet it is not pretended that it has ever been considered by that committee. We are expected to pass it upon the statement of a gentleman of this House whose constituents are interested in it. That item has gone into the bill, and I am asked to swallow that dose also. The claim may be meritorious; but I have not, nor has any other member of the House, the means of knowing whether it has merit or is entirely destitute of merit.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is it not certified here in the usual way through the appropriate officers of the Department?

Mr. PRICE. Oh, you can get almost anything "certified" here. Do we not see that illustrated in the case of these excessive pensions granted to widows of military and naval officers? When such a proposition is made, we have brigadier-generals, commodores, high officers of the Army or Navy joining with members of this House in begging that we shall vote the sum demanded to the widow of this or that gallant and distinguished officer.

It has occurred over and over again. If a suit is brought against me, and an attorney wants to charge me a thousand dollars as a fee, and you leave it to the attorneys to say whether a thousand dollars is too much to charge, they will all say, Oh, no; a thousand dollars is only fair. [Laughter.] I would not trust them a bit.

I wish to take the evidence of the facts, independent of this outside pressure about these corridors, as to whether we owe or not; and if we owe to these claimants what they ask at our hands, then we ought to pay it. And of course if we do not owe them we will refuse to pay them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Who has the disposition of the time for discussion on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor for an hour under the rules of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. After the gentleman from Missouri has occupied his hour will the friends of the deceased then be allowed to be heard? [Laughter.] So far the discussion has all been on one side.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question shall not be demanded and ordered the bill will be open to discussion.

Mr. BURNES. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, it is an unpleasant duty to appear in opposition to those with whom we come in contact every day, that is, the employés of the House; but that should not deter any gentleman here from doing his duty to the people he represents. The position is singular of gentlemen who in their individual capacity would not make a Christmas present to an old and faithful servant who had been in their employment for forty years and yet will come to Congress and vote without any consideration whatever $80,000 of the people's money to these employés. The money in the Treasury of the United States so far as Congress is concerned is in trust, and we are simply the trustees of the people for its collection and expenditure; and while we might be liberal with that we possess ourselves, we have no right to take a dollar of the people's money unless there is consideration given to this Government for it. And if gentlemen would only keep in view that cardinal principle that we are the trustees of this fund, we would not have cause to reproach ourselves with any such legislation as has recently been adopted.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if any gentleman here were a trustee of an estate, would he not be ten times more careful in the expenditure of the money arising out of that estate than if it were his own? Do you think any member of this House as the trustee of a private estate would give one cent from that trust for anything unless he got good consideration for it? Our position here is analogous to that of a trustee of an estate.

The employés of this House complain they do not get sufficient salary; that they do not get as large a salary as those employed in the Senate; that the employés of the Senate get by comparison a better salary than the employés of the House. Now by comparison with the salary of members of Congress of the House they get a much better salary, without anything like the labor, without anything like the responsibility and care incident to the position of a Representative on this floor. Their positions could be filled in twenty-four hours with just as capable men at the same salary.

Mr. Speaker, I like to be liberal as much as any man on this floor. I like to be kind and indulgent toward the excellent set of employés of this House, but I will not be so at the expense of other people. Members on this floor who seek to display friendly feelings toward the employés in doing so should not be forgetful of the duty they owe to the people they represent. Something can be said for the sessional employés, but the annual men should not get paid for thirteen months when they do not work as yet eight out of the year.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] said the other day that on the average the people of the United States receive but little more than $300 a year. Our working people, on the average, as shown by statistics, by hard and arduous labor in a year barely get over $300 per capita, out of which they have to support themselves and their families. It is an ill-gotten liberality that permits this House to put into this bill a gratuity of one month's extra pay to the employés of this House. Let us be just before we are generous, and when we are generous let it be with our own money.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does the gentleman from New Jersey favor the passage of this bill?

Mr. McADOO. No; I favor recommitting the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield to me for three minutes.

Mr. BURNES. I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. HISCOCK. I only desire, Mr. Speaker, in that brief period of time to call the attention of the House and the country to this fact: that every day's session of this Congress costs the country, costs the tax-payers (I am now speaking for the tax-payers) $30,000.

And I ask gentlemen on this floor to compute just how long these speeches over a one-thousand-dollar claim, or a two-thousand-dollar claim, or any little insignificant claims—these speeches in the interest of economy, for the protection of tax-payers, in behalf of the poor man that gentlemen seem to have always near their hearts while here in Congress—I say, I ask them to compute the length of time these speeches have protracted this session, and just how much they have cost to these tax-payers, and in my judgment they will make discovery of the fact that on every little item which we can find in an appropriation bill to talk about economy it costs the country and costs the tax-payers in the aggregate five times the whole sum involved in the item that you are discussing.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly, if I can have time to respond.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. How much less is the cost per day when Congress is not in session?

Mr. HISCOCK. The daily sessions of Congress cost the country about $65,000 or $66,000, and I suppose that about half of that is annual, and would have to be paid whether Congress was in session or not. The other half, about $30,000 a day, depends upon the fact as to whether or not we are in session, and is made up of such expenditures as printing, and daily, weekly, or monthly salaries of clerks, and many other such items.

Now, I desire to call the attention of my economic friends on the other side to the fact I have stated, and hope they will calmly consider it. Remember, gentlemen, it is now the 10th day of July. Let us vote and get ready to adjourn and go home.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, the sympathy of the distinguished gentleman from New York for the overburdened tax-payers is fully appreciated, and appreciated at its full worth by me. So long as the gentleman from New York could vote in propositions upon this bill to appropriate money by amendments to the bill there seemed to be limit neither to his speech nor to his desire for expenditure. But now at the close of the discussion, after he and his associates have loaded the bill down with amendments that can not possibly meet the judgment of the country, he comes and talks about the expenses that we are incurring in honest efforts to rid the bill of appropriations which are, in my honest opinion, but little less than legalized robbery.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to ask the gentleman a question: Who is it you are referring to when you say "he and his associates?" [Cries of "You!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURNES. I had supposed, Mr. Speaker, that it was entirely unnecessary to be more explicit in my statement.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; it is not unnecessary; it is entirely necessary that the gentleman should state it, for I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that in the main I have stood by him and his committee with the bill.

Mr. BURNES. Then let me congratulate the gentleman, for when he stands with the committee he is distinctly in the right. [Cries of "Oh!" and derisive laughter on the Republican side.] And furthermore, I appreciate the personal integrity and honor of the distinguished gentleman from New York, and concede that his action is generally commendable; but if we are to be charged with the number of hours we occupy here in speech the gentleman from New York will stand debited as high as any member upon this floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir; you are clearly mistaken about that. The gentleman has now right around him, within reach of his hand, gentlemen who have consumed far more time than I have. The gentleman on your right [referring to Mr. SPRINGER] takes the most time.

Mr. BURNES. No matter. If I read aright the hearts of the people of this country they will stand any amount of expenditure either in time or money in striking out from this or any other bill an appropriation such as that against which we are now contending. They will have no objection to the expenditure we incur for that purpose. Although I ought to stand by this bill in the ordinary course of nature, because I look upon it somewhat as a child or bantling of my own, over which I have stood watch and ward for several weary months, giving it the severest labor, yet I would feel dishonored when I returned to my constituents if I had to say to them I helped vote away your money to gentlemen who, whatever their merits, and I do not doubt they are great, have no more claim or right to that money under the laws of the land than the veriest beggar who walks upon Pennsylvania avenue. As the bill is now amended I shall vote against its passage. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. Pending that I move to recommit the bill with the instructions I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to strike out that portion of the bill which provides for one month's extra compensation for the annual and session employés of the House and to the House reporters and Capitol police.

Mr. REAGAN. Upon that I move the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to amend the instructions——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas demands the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to strike out that Texas appropriation.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. On the motion to commit with instructions I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 53 members voting therefor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether this is not a divisible question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. May there not be a vote on the motion to recommit simply? I am distinctly in favor of recommitting this bill, but do not want to limit the action of the committee by any kind of instructions. I will vote against the bill as it is.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think that having only a majority of 40, gentlemen on the other side ought to have two tries at an appropriation bill in order to satisfy themselves.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. We will vote to recommit your bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the decisions upon this question to be read, from which the gentleman from Indiana will see it has been decided many times in the House and upon appeal from the decision of the Chair that motions to recommit with instructions are not divisible.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the demand of any member, before the question is put, a question shall be divided if it include propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain.

But it has been decided on appeals that on motions to commit with instructions or on the different branches of instructions on a Senate amendment, on an amendment reported as a single amendment from a Committee of the Whole, on a series of resolutions proposed to be inserted in lieu of other matter, a division of the question can not be had.

The SPEAKER. These decisions are cited in the Digest, and run through a long series of years.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 151, nays 67, not voting 104; as follows:

Mr. BLANCHARD. I object.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DAWSON with Mr. RANNEY, until further notice.

Mr. BLANCHARD with Mr. WALLACE, on this vote.

Mr. ST. MARTIN with Mr. VAN EATON, on this vote.

Mr. HEARD with Mr. KELLEY, for this day.

Mr. LOWRY with Mr. LITTLE, for the rest of the day.

Mr. BLISS with Mr. NEECE, on this vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. When this bill shall be reported back from the Committee on Appropriations, will it then be required to go again to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to decide that question at present. At any rate, whether it goes to the Committee of the Whole or not, nothing inserted by a vote of the House could be stricken out.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman who made this inquiry what object there is in making a point of order to have this bill again go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I made the inquiry because I did not know what the rights of members of the House might be in this matter.

Mr. RANDALL. The reason I asked the gentleman the question was that I think I have a right to know what the purpose of the inquiry was, so as to be able to meet any difficulty that might be presented.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 2217) for the relief of Andrew T. McReynolds; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 8973) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa; and

A bill (H. R. 1840) granting a pension to Samuel F. Garrett.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS AND INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to present a privileged report. The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill which I send to the desk, have directed me to report the same back with the recommendation that it do not pass. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed, together with the report.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9702) to reduce and equalize duties on imports, to reduce internal-revenue taxes, and to modify the laws in relation to the collection of the internal revenue.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for reports from committees.

TAXES ON TOBACCO.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back adversely the joint resolution (H. Res. 164) repealing taxes, special and otherwise, upon tobacco and upon the sale and manufacture thereof. My colleague on the committee, Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, desires to file a separate report.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that adverse report be placed on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The report will be placed on the Calendar, and leave given to the minority to present their views, to be printed with the report of the committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. There is a bill pending on the passage of which the previous question has been ordered. I ask if that is not the first business now in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is in the class of business to which it belongs, unless some other order has been made by the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is a bill which comes over from last evening, the previous question having been ordered on its passage.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then it is a private bill, and it is in order on Friday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is a bill, however, on which action was taken in the House, and it was to be put upon its passage this morning. The order of the House was that it should be disposed of immediately after disposing of the general deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read what appears in the RECORD in relation to the understanding.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANCHARD. The bill is here then without recommendation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands. That there may be no misunderstanding the Chair will repeat the request of the gentleman from Kansas. He asks unanimous consent that this bill be engrossed and read a third time and that the previous question be ordered on its passage, so that the bill may be considered to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, and then that there shall be allowed ten minutes' debate on each side, and that the report shall also be read to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNES. I am compelled to object to the arrangement. But if the arrangement is so modified that the vote shall be taken after the passage of the general deficiency bill, I shall have no objection.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a privileged report. In accordance with the instructions of the House, I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. 9726) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for prior years, and for other purposes, with an amendment, striking out the provisions which the House instructed the committee to strike out.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I have been absent from the House two or three minutes, and I would be glad to know if the Committee on Appropriations has had a meeting. [Laughter.] I will ask my colleague the chairman of the committee whether the committee has had a meeting?

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Have they had a meeting since the House gave them these instructions?

Mr. RANDALL. The committee have had a meeting.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I understood that the meeting was before the instructions. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I have not received any notice of the meeting.

Mr. RANDALL. We made diligent search for you, but could not find you.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether the Committee on Appropriations have had a meeting since the instructions were given by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no personal knowledge upon that subject.

Mr. CANNON. And I have no personal knowledge.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I understand that the committee have not had a meeting.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, we have had a meeting, and have come to the conclusion which I have reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] demands the previous question.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I wish to know the fact, and I think the House is entitled to know whether the committee have had a meeting or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has answered the gentleman from Maine. The Chair does not know. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] states that the committee has had a meeting.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Since the House instructed them? Does the gentleman from Missouri say that?

Mr. BURNES. I do not know, sir, just when the House instructed. I paid no attention to the time; I was in the Committee on Appropriations, and I was instructed to make this report.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I want to see what this House is going to do——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is debate in order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is simply calling attention to a fact. The gentleman from Missouri demands the previous question upon the amendment and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there has been no answer to my inquiry and no statement that there has been a meeting of the committee since the instructions were given by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not decide that matter. If the House desires not to proceed to consider the bill because the committee has had no meeting, the Chair will submit that question to the House; but the Chair will state that the committee had no discretion whatever to do anything except what has been done. It was instructed simply to report the bill back to the House with an amendment striking out a certain provision. That was the instruction and order of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Which the committee have obeyed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the bill was recommitted to the committee with instructions. They have returned it to the House. Does it not stand now in the House as it did when it was originally reported from the committee, and if the point be made must it not be considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think so, although not very positive about it.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that point will not be made.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make that point.

Mr. LONG. If the Chair will read the rule, it will appear that every provision has been complied with. There is not a single item or matter in the bill which has not been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that is all the rule requires.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to add that there is nothing in the bill which the House has not had a vote upon; and if we should go into the Committee of the Whole it would not be competent for the committee to strike out anything that is in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly it is true that the Committee of the Whole could not strike out anything which has been inserted by vote of the House. The Chair will cause to be read clause 3 of Rule XXIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Mr. LONG. That rule has in every respect been complied with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that the bill as now reported contains no provision which has not already received full consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as required by the rule.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But there is a new proposition—to strike out.

The SPEAKER. The amendment to which the gentleman refers has been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That was in different form. It has not been considered since it was reported back from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LONG. It is in the same form as before.

The SPEAKER. This same amendment was considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by which it was reported to the House; it was afterward considered in the House, and agreed to; and then the bill was recommitted by vote of the House, with instructions to strike out that amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand the Speaker to decide that if we go into the Committee of the Whole we can not strike out anything which has been inserted by the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then we can not reach the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] appropriating something over $10,000 for rent of a wharf, &c., in Texas?

The SPEAKER. That amendment, having been inserted by a vote of the House, could not be struck out by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I withdraw my point. I had hoped that gentlemen on the other side who are in favor of economy would consent to have that proposition go out.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would be glad to have an opportunity to vote again in favor of striking it out.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to strike out the amendment appropriating $10,750 for use and occupation of a wharf, &c., at Galveston, Tex.; and on that motion I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question having been put on agreeing to the motion of Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana,

The SPEAKER said: In the opinion of the Chair the "noes" have it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to inquire whether it would be proper to instruct the committee further in regard to amending this bill.

The SPEAKER. It would not, because the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] demanded the previous question upon his motion, and that has been ordered by the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 101, nays 111, not voting 110; as follows:

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, on this vote.

Mr. ST. MARTIN with Mr. VAN EATON, on this vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries, and also the announcement of his approval of House bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 3037) relating to the licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to their crews.

An act (H. R. 4232) to reimburse the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for losses incurred through the failure of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., and for other purposes.

An act (H. R. 6397) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee to strike out one month's extra pay to the employés of the House.

Mr. GUENTHER. I demand a division on that amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 31.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to ask a question for information, and that is whether it is too late to raise the point of order on that provision of the bill relating to United States commissioners?

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. BAKER. It is new legislation.

The SPEAKER. It has been agreed to by the House.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to move to recommit with instructions to strike that out.

The SPEAKER. That can not be made now. Under a rule adopted in the Forty-sixth Congress——

Mr. BAKER. I desire to move to recommit with instructions to strike that out of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order now. After the previous question has been demanded and ordered on the passage of a bill under a special rule of the House a motion to recommit may be made.

Mr. BURNES rose.

Mr. RYAN. Is a second motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. Under the old rule of the House, which corresponds with the old parliamentary law, no motion was allowed to be made to recommit when the previous question had been ordered on its passage; but under a special rule of the House, after a bill has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and the question is on the passage of the bill even though the previous question has been demanded and ordered, one motion to recommit is in order.

Mr. BURNES. I move the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the question before the House.

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to be heard as to the propriety of the motion to recommit.

Mr. RANDALL. The previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BAKER. Is a motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated it would be under an express rule of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. One motion to recommit has already been made.

The SPEAKER. That was the ordinary parliamentary law, that there should be but one motion before the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; but there is a rule of the House which extends the privilege so that one motion may be made to recommit after the previous question has been ordered on the passage of the bill. That was not the parliamentary law before.

Mr. BAKER. I move to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out the following:

And hereafter the whole of the compensation and fees paid a commissioner, and to which he may be entitled for services in the examination of criminal charges, shall not exceed $800 per annum, or exceed that rate for any time less than a year: Provided, That for issuing any warrant or writ and for any other necessary service commissioners may be paid the same compensation as is allowed to clerks for like services, but they shall not be entitled to any docket fees.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. I make the point of order that is not in order, because it will lead to interminable consideration or reconsideration of what the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has done and the House itself has done when the bill was reported and acted upon. Such a system of parliamentary law would include the doing of a great many unnecessary and improper things. But I think it is excluded also under clause 4 of Rule XVI, which provides:

4. When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motions shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day at the same stage of the question.

The SPEAKER. It can not at the same stage of the question.

Mr. BAYNE. But, Mr. Speaker, the same stage of the question is now repeated. We are exactly in the same position we were in when the first motion to recommit was made; because the bill is now in the House in precisely the same condition it was in when it was recommitted by the House to the committee with the proposition in to pay the month's extra compensation to the employés of the House. That proposition, under instructions that were given by the House, was eliminated from the bill. The bill is now again reported to the House, but with that single elimination it is in precisely the same stage in which it was before that instruction was given by the House, and the committee have reported back the identical bill with that single proposition stricken out, as they were instructed to do. In other words, the bill was recommitted for a specific purpose; that specific purpose has been performed, and the same bill is now before us again.

The SPEAKER. This is not the same proposition at all. At the time the House recommitted the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report it back after striking out a certain clause, there was in the bill a provision to pay certain employés of the Government a month's extra compensation. The bill being then on its passage, it was recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations under these instructions. It now comes back under a rule of the House, and is on its third reading and open to further amendment. The bill does not now contain that clause. It is an entirely different report from the Committee on Appropriations from that upon which the House was acting an hour or so ago.

Mr. BAYNE. But the bill reported back is identically the same bill, with a single exception. That exception was brought about by a motion to recommit, and only one motion to recommit is in order under the rule. This, then, is a work of supererogation and is idling away the time of the House, for it may be continued, if this motion is allowable, for days, and might be continued indefinitely. I protest that the rules mean something, that parliamentary law means something, and the parliamentary law will not justify the waste of public time in this manner. I insist, then, that, inasmuch as the rule excludes two motions to commit, one with and one without instructions, the principle of parliamentary law, which has been decided by the present Speaker of the House over and over again, applies to this case, and the bill can not be again recommitted with any instructions whatever.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule there can be but one motion to recommit the bill when the question is on its passage, and no other motion can be made. But this is a different bill, a different report from the committee, and the motion is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

The motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURNES. On that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and on a division there were—ayes 96, noes 38.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it will be economy of time to have the yeas and nays, since there is no quorum voting.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that is not necessary.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I want those gentlemen on that side who believe in the extravagance of this legislation to pass the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I want the gentlemen on that side who put extravagance on the bill to vote for it.

Mr. MORRISON. You voted extravagant provisions on it and are now running away from them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 57, not voting 100; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw my vote. I am not permitted to vote on this particular measure by the rules of the House.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Upon reflection I consider I have a personal interest in the bill, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. BRADY. Upon consideration I believe I have a personal interest in the bill, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. ST. MARTIN with Mr. VAN EATON, on this vote.

Mr. MCCREARY with Mr. LONG, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. HERBERT with Mr. GUENTHER, for the remainder of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRISON. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution fixing a day for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, has had the same under consideration, and report it back with a substitute therefor, as follows:

"Resolved, That Tuesday, the 13th day of July, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be, and is hereby, set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Ways and Means, not to include any bill raising revenue; and if any bill shall be under consideration and not disposed of when the House adjourns on that day, the consideration of such bill shall continue from day to day, immediately after the reading of the Journal, until disposed of."

The committee is advised that there are on the Calendar several important measures reported from the Committee on Ways and Means which it is thought can be disposed of without much opposition, and therefore recommends the passage of the substitute.

Mr. HEWITT. I make the point of order on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). What is the point of order?

Mr. HEWITT. My point of order is that it is not competent for the Committee on Rules to report in the nature of a rule a regulation of debate which is intended for a single day and a single occasion pro hac vice. That is not a rule. The usual practice of the House has been for the committee which desired a day to come in with a resolution, submit it to the House, and take the action of the House upon it, under the rules. It seems to me this is a device by which the Committee on Rules, having power to report at any time, come into the House and do that which under the rules can only be done by resolution on the request of the committee from which the application comes.

There is no such application from the Committee on Ways and Means. I have heard of this now for the first time. It has never yet been considered in the committee. It comes here as a report from the Committee on Rules, and I take it this is the first time that any attempt has ever been made by the Committee on Rules to give a day certain to any committee of this House for the consideration of measures. It seems to me to be entirely contrary to any rule of order I am familiar with, and contrary to the practice of the House on any previous occasion.

Mr. MORRISON. I will make no reply to so much of the remarks of the gentleman from New York in making which he undertook to say this resolution is a device. I think when he comes to reflect upon the matter he will prefer that he had left that unsaid.

This matter was referred, in a resolution offered by myself, to the Committee on Rules for its consideration. In that way the Committee on Rules got control and jurisdiction of the subject. I probably ought to state what is the main object of the rule, but I need not explain that to the gentleman from New York. The object is to reach and consider the bill or joint resolution reported to the House by the Committee on Ways and Means requiring the paying out of some part of the surplus money now in the Treasury. In reporting that measure, I am sorry we who favor it did not have the approval of the gentleman from New York. The object of this resolution, this amendment to the rules or whatever it may be called, is to reach that resolution from the Ways and Means and have it considered in the House. That is the whole of it. It comes here regularly by a resolution introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules and upon which that committee has acted, and now the House can approve or reject.

Mr. MCKINLEY. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCKINLEY. My question is whether it is the purpose under this resolution assigning a day to the Committee on Ways and Means to consider the bills relating to treaties?

Mr. MORRISON. It is not. The treaties all affect the revenue question. We do not propose to consider any of them or anything involving that question under this order if the House shall pass or approve it.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] says the House ought to determine the manner in which we are to proceed or whether we are to proceed at all in the consideration of measures. The Constitution of the United States gives to this House the power to prescribe all its rules of procedure. This House can do it in the first instance by its own motion, as it does before it is organized and has its committees, or it can appoint a committee to prescribe those rules. And in regulating the proceedings of the House it is no matter whether the rule be adopted by the House without reference or on the recommendation of the Committee on Rules.

The Committee on Rules have made a report and returned to this House a method by which a measure can be taken up and acted on, and that is perfectly legitimate. It is within the province of this House at all times to change its rules. A continuing power to do so rests with the House at all times, and is necessary to be exercised for the conduct of its business. The House finding that according to its existing rule it could not reach a measure on its Calendar necessary to be considered, and which a majority of the House may determine should be considered, it becomes necessary to change the existing rule; and how is that change to be made? By some one offering a resolution and having it referred and reported on.

The gentleman from New York knows this measure could not be reached under our existing rules; and if there is a majority of this House that wishes to take up a measure and consider it when its consideration is not provided for by existing rules, the only way by which the House can reach that measure is to change its rules; and in order to do so it is necessary to have a resolution introduced and have the Committee on Rules report it for the action of the House, and that is what they have done.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, this proposition comes from the Committee on Rules properly. The subject was referred to that committee. Let us be frank and open. The object is to reach the consideration of a bill or a joint resolution proposing to pay out of the Treasury to the extent, I suppose, of $70,000,000, $10,000,000 a month, and thus save $2,100,000 annually to the tax-payers of the United States.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Has not the Secretary of the Treasury authority to do that now?

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose the Secretary has that power, but we are a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and have a right to some opinion on the subject. It is enough for me to know that the Secretary is not paying out that money as fast as he might.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why not?

Mr. RANDALL. It is a plain proposition, Mr. Chairman, and I will illustrate it in this way: Does anybody suppose that I, as a business man, would keep on deposit in a bank $700,000, for which I was drawing nothing in the way of interest, while I had out obligations bearing interest, whether at 3 or 6 per cent.? No business man would for a moment do such a thing, according to my judgment.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is going into the merits of the proposition which he says is sought to be got at. That question is not under discussion here now.

Mr. RANDALL. But it is well for the House to understand what is the object of some of the members of the Committee on Rules in reporting this rule.

Mr. HEWITT. But you have been arguing the merits of the proposition which you say the rule will enable you to take up.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I have said all I want to say on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard on the point of order. If this amendment of the rules——

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SOWDEN. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question of order raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. SOWDEN. But the gentleman ceased speaking.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, if this proposition is in order, then it is in order at all times for the Committee on Rules to bring into the House a resolution which shall take from the Calendar any and every specific measure which the Committee on Rules see fit to have considered.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Rules only recommend. It is for the House to determine.

Mr. HEWITT. I understand that, Mr. Speaker, but I want to know where the jurisdiction is. This method of proceeding vests in the Committee on Rules jurisdiction over the Calendars and over every proposition upon the Calendars; it puts in their hands the power to determine for this House what measures shall be considered and what shall not be considered. And now since the gentleman has stated what the object of this proposition is, let me call the attention of gentlemen who belong to other committees to the organization of the Committee on Rules. A majority of that committee is three, and those three are members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Hence this puts it in the power of the Ways and Means Committee, or the dominant influence in that committee——

Mr. MORRISON. And if the gentleman will allow me, the majority of the members of the Ways and Means Committee who are also on the Committee on Rules agree with him and are opposed to this resolution.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has no right to speak for the Committee of Ways and Means unless he has had this subject before that committee, and this proposition has never been submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means. I, for one, never heard of it until I heard of it here.

Mr. MORRISON. It was not sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. It was sent by the House to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, my point is this: A majority of the Committee on Rules are members of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the practical result is that the Committee of Ways and Means are running the Committee on Rules, and are bringing before this House a proposition to enable them to do something which they say they can not do unless the rules are changed. Why should the rules of the House be changed with reference to this proposition more than any other? Every gentleman here has business on the Calendars that he would like to have disposed of before Congress adjourns. Why, then, should the Committee on Ways and Means pick out its measures and have them considered by the House simply because the members of that committee are able to control the Committee on Rules?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman is not speaking to the point of order.

A MEMBER. There are other important measures awaiting consideration.

Mr. HEWITT. Yes; there are other important measures, a great many of them, and I object to any one committee of this House having the inside track, or, as some gentlemen would express it, "getting the bulge" on the other committees of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The Chair is ready to rule upon the question. As the Chair understands, this resolution on being introduced was referred by the House to the Committee on Rules. It is competent, in the judgment of the Chair, for the House in this manner to change its rules, if this involves a change. The adoption of this resolution would be pro tanto nothing more than a change of the rules; and the proper method of making such a change under the rules is upon a report from the Committee on Rules. Therefore the Chair can see nothing in the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. MORRISON. I think I ought to say, in justice to the Committee on Rules or some of its members and to the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, if any gentleman on either committee requires any justification, that this joint resolution (the merits of which I do not propose to discuss) the consideration of which we are trying now to reach was considered by the Ways and Means Committee and reported to the House. Then those of us who favored the measure wanted it considered, and I introduced a resolution, just as members of a dozen committees have done here, and had it referred. Some gentlemen have had such resolutions referred to one committee and some to another; but gentleman here will all bear me witness that days and times and preferences have been fixed by special order of the House upon propositions of the several committees which the House approved. The Labor Committee got a day; the Committee on Agriculture obtained a special order for its business, and several other committees had days fixed for the consideration of their business in exactly this method—by reporting a resolution and having the House consider it.

This resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules as a matter of convenience. On that committee there are more members of the Ways and Means Committee who oppose the resolution which we propose to consider than those who favor it. I do not make that statement by way of argument; but it seemed to me the gentleman from New York had said so much I ought to make that statement.

Unless some gentleman wants to speak further upon this matter, I will move the previous question.

Mr. STEELE. To settle this question about the surplus, I ask unanimous consent that we take up the general pension bill and pass it at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] demands the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution reported by him.

Mr. HEWITT. I do not know whether the gentleman from Illinois has been speaking on the merits of the resolution——

Mr. MORRISON. I have not.

Mr. RANDALL. It was I who committed that indiscretion.

Mr. HEWITT. I mean the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MORRISON. If the gentleman would like to say something on the resolution——

Mr. HEWITT. I should like to do so. I do not want much time.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman so much time as he wants.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois stated that this proceeding is in conformity to the practice of this House by which other committees have had days assigned to them for the consideration of their business. I think that must have been an inadvertent statement on the part of the gentleman.

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; it is true. There is no other way of reaching business the House may desire to act upon.

Mr. HEWITT. The practice has been just the reverse. In no other case has a committee had a resolution of this kind referred to the Committee on Rules to be reported back here under the privilege. On the contrary——

Mr. MORRISON. I did not say that. I said resolutions had been reported by different committees and acted on by the House, and this must have the approval of the House.

Mr. HEWITT. The gentleman said this was exactly in accordance with the practice of the House in the case of other committees. I say that in no other case has any other committee gone to the Committee on Rules and availed itself of that committee's superior privilege to report here at any time. On the contrary, resolutions have been introduced here and have been referred to the committees having jurisdiction of the particular business, have been reported to the House, and have come up here in their regular order. This comes up in the House out of regular order, under the privilege which the Committee on Rules possesses, and which no other committee possesses. Of course the object is to arrive at something that can not be otherwise arrived at. When that question comes up we shall have something to say about it, for I trust there will be discussion on it. It seems to me, however, that this is an irregular method of arriving at a discussion of a question which is not of superior importance to many other questions with which other committees of the House are charged.

Mr. MORRISON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on adopting the resolution, there were—ayes 101, noes 40.

Mr. HEWITT. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MORRISON and Mr. HEWITT were appointed.

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 184, nays 34, not voting 104; as follows:

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. RICHARDSON said: I ask by unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT and Mr. JAMES objected.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. FUNSTON, for the rest of the day.

Mr. FUNSTON. I am paired with Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, but I was assured he would vote in the affirmative like myself, and therefore I have had my vote recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. ROCKWELL, for this day.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. ROMEIS.

Mr. LAWLER with Mr. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. SENEY, on this vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order of business, which I understand to be the consideration of the bill granting a pension to Catharine Waters. Does the Chair recognize me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP in the chair). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, and understood him to call up the special order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the House should proceed to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It will not take more than twenty minutes to dispose of this bill granting a pension to Catharine Waters.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to dispense with the business of the morning hour, if that be necessary to get to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is operating under the previous question on the pension bill for Catharine Waters. The question is on the passage of the bill under the previous question, and it is not in order to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to postpone the further consideration of that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the question of consideration on that bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I submit to the Chair that the question of consideration can not be raised against that bill, because the previous question has been ordered on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the previous question to which the gentleman from Illinois refers has for its effect under the rule to make that bill in order immediately after the reading of the Journal the next legislative day when such business is in order, and which in this case will be next Friday. The Chair further understands there was an agreement last night, but it was no more than setting a special order, and such a special order as may be antagonized and set aside.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to say that good faith and justice demand that the gentleman from Indiana should not come in now and antagonize this arrangement, especially in view of the fact that by the absence of members this House has been left every Friday evening under the control of one member, who in order to prevent business will insist on a quorum being present. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the case called up by the gentleman from Illinois, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 325) granting a pension to Catharine Waters.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 87, noes 52.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that there be a session of the House this evening, commeneing at 8 o'clock, to consider the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Can we have the assurance that some gentleman will not be here to call a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Several members objected.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

CATHARINE WATERS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask now that the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States, the name of Catharine Waters, mother of Thomas Waters, deceased, late steward of the steamer Benefit, at the rate of $8 per month.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out the words "at the rate of eight dollars per month" and insert "twelve dollars per month."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that by order of the House, made last evening, there is to be twenty minutes' debate on this bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is an agreement that the report shall be read first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done in the time of the gentleman.

Mr. GOFF. That was not the understanding.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No; the report was to be read.

Mr. DORSEY. That was a part of the agreement.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was expressly understood that the reading of the report was not to be taken out of the time allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report.

The report was read at length.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Unless the gentleman from Louisiana desires to make some remarks in reference to this bill, I am willing to take a vote upon it now without debate. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the hammer shall fall when I shall have occupied seven minutes out of the ten I am entitled to in this discussion.

The bill is before the House without any recommendation from the Committee of the Whole. It was I who had the temerity, a week ago last night, to demand a quorum upon its passage; and I stand here to assert, after a very careful examination of the original papers filed in this case, that if there ever was a pension bill which should not pass this is one.

Mr. Speaker, Thomas Waters, on account of whose death this pension is asked, was not only not in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of his death, but he was not even in the civil employment of the Government. I have before me the record as it comes from the Pension Office, and it shows that this case was rejected by the Pension Bureau in December, 1882, upon the following grounds:

Rejected, as the sailor was serving on a chartered steamer as one of the crew, hired and paid by the owners, at the time he was killed.

This steamer, the Benefit, was not a war vessel. She was simply a transport chartered for the purpose of bearing Lieutenant Terry, with a force of fifty men, carrying dispatches. This man Thomas Waters was not the steward, but he is described in one of the affidavits in the record as second steward, or cook, employed not by the United States Government but by the owner of the boat, who was a civilian and who paid his wages.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I can not yield. It is not true, as stated in the report, that the boat was under the immediate command of the United States naval officer in charge of the expedition up Red River. The master of the Benefit at the time this man was killed was Captain Hatcher, a civilian. His entire crew were civilians, and none of them, including Waters, were in the naval service of the United States. There is not a scintilla of evidence in the record that Waters ever engaged in any fight on behalf of the United States. A statement, sir, was made here a week ago that he seized a musket when the fight began and engaged in the fight. It is not true; the record makes no such disclosure.

Mr. HILL. The report says he did.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hold the original record of the case in my hand, and I challenge any man, the gentleman from Illinois himself, familiar as he is with the case, to take these papers and show anywhere in the record any evidence that this man ever engaged in any fight. The Benefit, this small steamer, was passing a battery on Red River and was fired into by the battery. The fire was returned by two cannon on board the Benefit, and if Waters had any hand in this firing the record totally fails to show it. And when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NEECE], who is the author of the report in this case, makes the statement in his report that "all the men on board the steamer were engaged in the fight," I challenge him to point out in the record any evidence to justify that assertion.

Mr. NEECE rose.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not yield at this time. This report is but a brief of the strong points (weak at best) in this record on behalf of the claimant, and it totally fails to show the weak points in the case. I judge, sir, it is in keeping with most of the favorable reports that have come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It shows the strong side only; it takes care to omit the facts damaging to the claimant's cause. For instance, there is nothing in the report to show that this application was rejected at the Pension Office because Thomas Waters was not either in the military, the naval, or the civil employment of the Government, and it fails to state that the Pension Bureau had discovered that his wages were paid by the owner of the boat and not by the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir; I will yield now for interruption.

Mr. PERKINS. Has the gentleman's attention ever been called to a bill granting a pension to Margaret A. Poland, widow of Alexander Poland, of Leesburg, State of Virginia, who was not in the military or naval service at all?

Mr. BLANCHARD. My attention has not been called to that bill, and it has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. PERKINS. It passed the House and the Senate, and the President approved the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Did that man fight?

Mr. PERKINS. He was murdered by a band of guerrillas, and was not in the military service at all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If we are to pension men who have not been in either the military, naval, or civil employment of the United States, I ask what is to prevent every roustabout on the thousand and one vessels employed or chartered by the United States Government during the war, who happened to have been killed or wounded or disabled by sickness—what is to prevent them or their widows or parents from coming here and asking pensions? If a cook like this man can do it, why can not a roustabout do it?

I for one am opposed to granting pensions in cases of this kind. We should confine the bounty of the Government to those who were disabled by wounds or sickness or to the dependents of those who were killed in the line of duty in the military and naval service of the Government, and not go beyond that, and pension men who were not even in the civil employment of the Government, much less its military or naval service.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The question I want to ask is this——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Louisiana that the seven minutes have expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What mysterious motive has induced the gentleman from Louisiana to pursue this gray-haired old woman whose son was stricken down while engaged in battle is something that is incomprehensible to me. The gentleman from Louisiana has said that he can not support this bill because this man was not in the military service of the United States. I hold in my hand here five bills that have been passed granting pensions to those that were never in the military or naval service. One of these bills was approved a few days ago by the President. That was a case where a man was shot down in Virginia who had done nothing more than invite four Union soldiers to his dinner-table, and while they were taking refreshments he was attacked by confederate soldiers and shot down. The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the bill in favor of the widow and the House passed it, the Senate passed it, and the President signed it. And yet the gentleman from Louisiana never raised a murmur.

I have in my hand another bill granting a pension to the dependent relative of a man named Jacobs, and standing on just the same basis as the bill which is reported here. Jacobs was in charge of a transport, under control of the Quartermaster's Department, going up the Tennessee River, I believe. While the boat was going up the river it was attacked by Forrest's cavalry, and that man, who was not even in the civil service of the Government, being employed by the Quartermaster's Department to convey that boat up the river, was killed; and a bill was passed by Congress granting a pension in that case, and it was sanctioned by the President.

There are numerous cases coming down from the Revolution where men have been put on the pension-rolls who were never enlisted in the service; and unless the gentleman from Louisiana is ignorant of the history of the country he must know he is assailing this woman upon false grounds when he charges she ought not to have a pension because her son was not enlisted in the service.

Mr. NEECE. I ask the gentleman to give me a minute.

Mr. CANNON. I would like the gentleman from Illinois to come down to this case now pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This man was a sailor, employed on another steamer from 1862 down to 1863, and was then discharged on the expiration of his term of service. He afterward became a steward on this other vessel, which was a transport, that was ordered to go up the Red River and convey some one hundred and fifty Union troops under the command of Lieutenant Terry.

They were compelled to pass the battery on the river. Under the command of Lieutenant Terry, as shown by the evidence, the boat was ordered to pass that battery. In passing the battery this man and several others on board were killed by the fire of the enemy; and the report states, and it is borne out by the evidence, that all the men on that boat were engaged in that conflict.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I challenge the production of that evidence.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The evidence is on record.

Mr. NEECE. Let me say a word on that point. I assert that every word contained in the report on this case is based upon evidence furnished by the Pension Office and other documents.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I defy either gentleman from Illinois to find that evidence. Here is the record. [Holding up a bundle of papers.]

Mr. NEECE. If I had known there was to be an attack upon the report I would have been prepared to meet it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, let me say further that I am informed by a member of the committee that the gentleman from Louisiana has only a portion of the papers in the case, and if he had been as industrious in endeavoring to get at the facts, in his efforts to defeat this bill, as the members of the committee have been in endeavoring to do justice, he would not stand here and make the assertions he has made.

Mr. NEECE. If the gentleman from Louisiana had given me notice that he proposed to make any criticism upon the report I would have produced the papers to sustain it.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Would not this applicant have been entitled to a pension under the law if that boat had been a war boat?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this had been a gunboat instead of a chartered vessel the mother of this young man would have been entitled to a pension under the law, and the only reason given by the Commissioner of Pensions why she could not receive a pension was that the vessel on which her son was engaged when he was killed was not a gunboat. The ground for the rejection of the claim was purely technical.

Mr. BURROWS. It was not a gunboat, but it was a transport in the employment of the United States Government for military purposes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It was a transport in the employment of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, and it was conveying soldiers of the United States Army when it was assailed by the enemy, and this man, standing at his post, as the evidence shows, and engaged in the fight, was struck down and killed by the fire of the enemy.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Was he not brought under the fire of that battery by the order of an officer of the United States?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He was forced by the commander of the United States troops upon that boat to pass the battery on that boat. He was under the orders of the military arm of the service, and bravely stood at his post until he was killed.

Mr. BURROWS. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] I will read a provision of the general law in regard to pensions:

> Any master serving on a gunboat, or any pilot, engineer, sailor, or other person not regularly mustered into the service, upon any war vessel, shall be entitled to a pension, &c.

Now the only distinction between this case and the case contemplated in the law is that the boat on which this man was killed was not technically a war vessel.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. And I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if it was not a mere technicality which prevented that vessel from being called a war vessel?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The affidavit of the commander of the vessel shows that he was employed in the military service of the Government, and that the vessel was practically a war vessel.

Mr. LYMAN. And acting under military orders.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; now the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] are likely to mislead the House, for he has attempted to create the impression that this bill is not recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I merely wish to say, in conclusion, that the bill was reported unanimously from the committee, and would have been favorably reported to this House by the Committee of the Whole, if it had not been for the factious opposition of the gentleman from Louisiana, which induced me to compromise by agreeing to bring the bill before the House in this manner.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the record in this case, which I have before me, I applied for at the room of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. These papers were furnished to me by the clerk of that committee as what he said was the record in this case, and I challenge the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that this is not the whole record. Where were the papers if they were not there?

A MEMBER. Some member of the committee might have had them.

Mr. BLANCHARD. After this report was made on the 26th of May the papers in the case were not only returned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NEECE] to the clerk of the committee, but they were sent back by the clerk to the Pension Office, and it was at my request that he again sent to the office for them and obtained them for me. So when gentlemen come in here and say that I have not all the papers, I deny and challenge the statement.

Mr. NEECE. If the gentleman had given me proper time I would have produced the papers.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have all the papers, and I assert——

Mr. NEECE. I assert that you have not.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have all the papers, and I assert that there is not one particle of evidence to show that this party was engaged in the fight. In this fight, which consisted only in firing upon the vessel, three men were killed, two civilians and one soldier. Furthermore, this transport was not carrying up one hundred and fifty men, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], to join the Army of the United States above that point.

Mr. NEECE. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There were only fifty men on that boat, acting as an escort to the officer who was bearing dispatches.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point is that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] has the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I want to know how much time the gentleman from Louisiana has left.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will keep the gentleman's time. The gentleman from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman from Illinois has gratuitously intimated that I had some special reason for opposing this bill. I have nothing in the world against this old lady. I would vote her a pension as quickly as I would vote it to anybody else under the circumstances, but standing here as a Representative, I feel it my duty to say that no bill of this sort shall pass this House without at least encountering a protest from me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House the question will now be taken on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 115, noes 39.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, is that a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I make that point.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I call for the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 55, not voting 132; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the additional pairs.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the order of the House does not require that we adjourn at 5 o'clock.

A MEMBER. It is necessary to finish the proceedings connected with the roll-call.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It is not necessary. A few days ago, Speaker CARLISLE being then in the chair, we adjourned in the midst of a roll-call.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Time and again it has been held that a roll-call can not be interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair the arrival of the hour previously fixed for adjournment does not interrupt a roll-call and the announcements connected therewith. The Clerk will read the additional pairs.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. TARSNEY.

Mr. MCKENNA with Mr. BYNUM, for the residue of to-day and for Monday.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.). In accordance with the order heretofore made, the House now stands adjourned until Monday morning next at 11 o'clock.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 12, 1886.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the Committee on Privileges and Elections may have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the Committee on Privileges and Elections have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. That leave will be granted if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA LANDS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that House bill 7087, which has been returned from the House, be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7087) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the purchase-money on the sale of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, which was returned from the House of Representatives in accordance with the request of the Senate made July 9, 1886.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, and ask for a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. DAWES, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. MAXEY were appointed.

MRS. SARAH YOUNG.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to call attention to a pension bill, to Senate bill 2113, on which a conference committee was appointed, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], myself, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] were named as conferees on the part of the Senate. I desire to have the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] appointed on the committtee of conference instead of myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks to be excused from service upon the committee of conference on the bill (S. 2113) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Young, and that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] be appointed to take his place. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears none.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending that an appropriation be made in the sundry civil appropriation bill for approaches and heating apparatus for certain public buildings; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a recommendation from the United States Treasurer that the appropriation in the sundry civil appropriation bill for recoinage of gold and silver coins be increased from $10,000 to $30,000; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, transmitted by the governor of the State, relative to the national defenses. If there be no objection the resolutions, without being read, will be ordered to be printed as a document, and will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

The resolutions are as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas reports made to Congress by the President, Cabinet officers, the fortification board, the committees of the Senate and of the House indicate that the Government of the United States is without forts, guns, ships, or other defenses capable of successfully resisting a hostile attack made not only by any of the great powers of Europe, like Great Britain, France, Germany, or Russia, but even by second or third rate powers, such as Spain, Chili, or China; and

Whereas this defenseless condition of our country is humiliating to our national pride and patriotism, is unbecoming a free people possessing the vast and unrivaled resources at our command, and has rightly caused profound anxiety and discontent among our people, manifested by all the methods of expression through which the popular will finds utterance, including the action of State Legislatures, the voice of the public press, and the declarations and appeals of private citizens; and especially is evidenced by a public letter from Samuel J. Tilden, a citizen so eminent, so wise, and so held in the esteem and affection of the people that his advice sways and influences millions of his admiring fellow-citizens: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That we view with grave regret and disappointment the inaction of Congress in regard to making adequate and ample provision for the common defense of our country, and that Louisiana is willing to bear her share of the burdens to create a perfect and complete system of national defense for the protection of our seaboard and water and land frontier lines fronting on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, on the Mexican Gulf, and the great lakes and water ways of our northern boundaries; and that, in our opinion, the resources of the Government should, without hesitation or stint, be devoted to creating the means and appliances capable of protecting our frontiers and exposed cities and coasts and the creation and building of a navy capable against all adversaries of sustaining American honor and interests at home and abroad and affording some foundation and basis to the national Executive to assert and enforce our rights and policy, whether involved in the pursuits of our hardy fishermen of the Northeast or complicated by efforts of European nations to establish new protectorates or colonies in continental America, or over or upon its isthmian connections, or upon any of its dependent islands.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their best efforts for the adoption by Congress of the policy recommended in the foregoing preamble and resolution.

Be it further resolved, That the governor be requested to send copies hereof to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the American, Atlantic and Pacific Ship-canal Company (Nicaragua), remonstrating against the incorporation by Congress of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of 75 citizens of McGregor, Tex., praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, Congressional and Presidential elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Badgers and other citizens of Texas, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, Congressional and Presidential elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS. In behalf of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], who is absent from the session of the Senate by reason of illness in his family, I submit a written report to accompany certain amendments reported by the Senator from the Committee on Finance to the bils (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits. I simply ask that the report be printed, to accompany those amendments, and let it be done in the name of the Senator from Nevada in whose behalf I present the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2611) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Louis River at the most accessible point between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2796) to establish a land office at Lamar, Colo., reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 13) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he reported a joint resolution (S. R. 77) in relation to the claim made by John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles for rifled ordnance claimed as the invention of said Read and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department in 1856, for which no compensation has been made; also in relation to the claim of William E. Woodbridge, based upon the plea of alleged priority in this line of invention; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 658) for the relief of Francis W. Haldeman, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2833) to stop all payments of public money to James B. Eads, his associates, or assigns, for past, present, or future work at the South Pass of the Mississippi River until otherwise ordered by Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2834) granting a pension to Mrs. Hettie K. Painter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2835) granting a pension to Miss Juliet G. Howe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

OBSTRUCTIVE DEPOSITS IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are now in order. [A pause.] If there be none such, the Calendar, under the special order, will be taken up for consideration.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to go back upon the Calendar to Order of Business No. 700, being Senate bill 2157, which was read through upon Saturday last. Senators will remember the peculiar circumstances under which it was objected to. I think it can be passed in a moment without any discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have announced the first bill in order on the Calendar regularly, and then submit the request of the Senator from New York.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 125) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis was announced as first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending this, the Senator from New York asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill which was passed over informally, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2157) to prevent obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York city, by dumping or otherwise, and to punish and prevent such offenses, and making other provisions in connection therewith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH FRANCIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The business regularly in order before the Senate will now be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. Res. 125) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is not here.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator from Missouri I think has no objection to the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. INGALLS. I apprehend in the present condition of the Senate it would hardly be worth while to insist upon the consideration of the joint resolution if anybody wants time. I conceive that if the yeas and nays or the Senate roll were to be called it would not be possible to obtain the presence of a quorum without delay. However, I am entirely willing that this measure shall go on if any Senator desires to be heard upon it.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not understand that the Senator from Missouri has any objection to this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection may be made at any stage.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The joint resolution comes from the Committee on Commerce, and I shall not interpose any objection to its consideration, although I was not in favor of the resolution when it passed the committee and I am not in favor of it now.

Mr. EVARTS. I shall not occupy any time on the subject if the Senate are now ready to take it up and proceed to vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? It has been heretofore read at length.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the joint resolution go over. I know the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] wants to be heard upon it, and he is not here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution goes over.

Mr. EVARTS. Allow me to ask how it will stand then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It stands upon the Calendar as it stood before, but it will not be taken up again under this rule.

Mr. EVARTS. It can be taken up at any time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be taken up on motion at any time.

ISAAC HARTER.

The bill (S. 1802) for the relief of Isaac Harter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Isaac Harter, of Herkimer, N. Y., late of Company C, New York Heavy Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. BARBARA FUCHS.

The bill (H. R. 6489) granting a pension to Mrs. Barbara Fuchs was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Barbara Fuchs, stepmother of John Fuchs, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. VEST. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER May 11, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6489) granting a pension to Mrs. Barbara Fuchs, have carefully examined the same, and adopt the report of the House of Representatives, and report in favor of the passage of the bill.

The claimant filed her application for a pension as the stepmother of John Fuchs, late private of Company H, Sixth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, and who was killed in action June 19, 1864, at Petersburg, Va. Soldier was never married. Claim was rejected on the ground that there is no title in claim, she not being the natural mother of soldier.

M. Feelder and Jacob Blum testify that they knew claimant as the stepmother of soldier; that soldier at the time of his father's (Sebastian Fuchs) marriage with said claimant was a child of about three years of age.

John G. Steiger and Philip Eder testify that claimant's husband, at soldier's death, was feeble and unable to support her.

Michael Feelder and Jacob Blum further testify that claimant has not remarried since the death of soldier's father, April 5, 1867. He was a laboring man, sickly and unable to support his family. He used to mend shoes, and had no income from his real estate. Since his death claimant has supported herself by selling the real estate she owned. They owned some real estate in Fountain City, Wis., worth about $2,000, and she has sold the most of it to support herself. Soldier worked for his parents prior to his enlistment, and gave all his earnings to them, and did this for three years before his enlistment.

In soldier's letter to parents, bearing date February, 1864, at Camp Washburn, he sends for their support $60 out of his bounty of $75; he also sent them his certificate of muster, to enable them to draw the bounty given by the town, with instructions to use it for their support.

The applicant at the death of her husband (soldier's father) was left with four girls to support, the oldest being seventeen and the youngest two and one-half years of age. The soldier's letter written but a few months before his death, and his sending a large portion of his earnings to the support of his parents, strengthened with other testimony showing that prior to and at the time of his enlistment he felt it his duty to contribute to the support of his father's family, evidence the fact that had he lived he would have cared for her who cared for him in his infancy in her now poor and helpless condition.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the pending order of business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is Order of Business 1177, the bill (H. R. 6489) granting a pension to Mrs. Barbara Fuchs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that bill involves rather a new principle, and we had better let it lie over until to-morrow without prejudice. I should like to look at it a little further. I have just come in, having been detained in the room of the Committee on Appropriations. I shall look into it. I do not object to its retaining its place.

Mr. BLAIR. Let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say let it retain its place and not go on the other Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

JAMES B. RUSSELL.

The bill (H. R. 5696) for the relief of James B. Russell was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that case may be passed over so as not to lose its place on the Calendar. It has been reported favorably, and the Commissioner of Pensions is now investigating the matter. I shall inquire of him if he has any report on it. I want the bill to retain its place on the present Calendar and go over without objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same order as in the previous case will be made.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The bill to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. Let that bill go over. It can not be taken up for consideration under the present rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection

ILLEGAL TONNAGE DUES.

The bill (H. R. 1651) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage dues was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER. Let that go over.

Mr. FRYE. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. FRYE subsequently said: I wish to call attention to House bill 1651, to which I entered an objection. I withdraw the objection, and ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally.

ALEXANDER K. SHEPARD.

The bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard was announced as next in order.

Mr. VEST. I see there is a minority report there. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the reading of the minority report?

Mr. VEST. No, sir; I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist upon the bill going over.

Mr. VEST. I do not know anything about it. I simply objected because I see there are two reports, and I supposed there would be debate upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it will take but a very few moments to dispose of the bill. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] submitted a minority report.

Mr. DOLPH. If I may interrupt the Senator, I will state that I shall only ask to have the minority report, which is very brief, read in order that I may place my views on record; that is all.

Mr. VEST. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. SPOONER. I can state the whole case in a very few words.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out "$17,268.53" and insert "$14,458.04;" so as to read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and required to pay to Alexander K. Shepard, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., the sum of $14,458.04, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SPOONER. I think in three minutes I can state to the Senate this case.

In 1865 the Government of the United States sold at public auction in Alabama a large quantity of old iron, brass, and copper. It was bid off by Mr. Shepard, for whose relief this bill is proposed. He paid $17,268.53 for it, cash for it, and the property was delivered to him. He sold a very small quantity of it, and had made a contract for the sale of the remainder at a profit of, I think, about $12,000, when the district attorney of the United States for that district, conceiving, perhaps, that the Government had some title to it because it had been used in the rebellion, filed a libel against it in the name of the United States. The property was seized, and upon an affidavit that it could not be "protected," it was sold by order of the court, the court being Judge Busteed, who was afterward impeached I believe for malfeasance in office.

Mr. HOAR. He was not impeached.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, he was compelled to resign. It appears that the marshal sold the property for about $30,000. Five thousand dollars of this money was deposited in a national bank. The remainder of it was not in any way accounted for.

In the course of two years, and after a large expenditure of money by Mr. Shepard in defending his title, the court held that the title was good; that the Government had no claim upon the property. But the property was gone, and the proceeds of the sale of it, except what had been deposited in the bank, were gone. So Mr. Shepard found himself the vendee of the United States, having bought this property at a public sale and paid for it, with nothing to show for the large expenditure he had made in the purchase; his property was gone, and he had paid out three or four or five thousand dollars in defending his title against this suit, and brought in the name of the Government which had sold the property to him, and which had in its Treasury the purchase-money.

There is some reason to suppose that the whole transaction upon the part of the Government officers was little less than a conspiracy to do just what was done in fact, to take this property from the purchaser of it, sell it, and to divert the proceeds from the owner.

The bill is not to give this man damages for any breach of duty on the part of the Government officers, but it is simply to pay back to him the purchase-money, deducting therefrom what he has received from the bankruptcy court and the few hundred dollars he received from the sale of a part of the property before it was seized.

The minority report, which was presented by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], proceeds upon the theory that the Government of the United States ought not to be liable and is not liable in damages for the malfeasance or misfeasance of its agents or officers. I think that report so far as the principle which it enunciates is concerned is correct, but the principle is not applicable to the facts here. The majority of the committee favoring the passage of the bill do not dissent from the proposition of law asserted by the minority. We all agree that the Government is not liable in law to pay any damages to Mr. Shepard because of the malfeasance of the marshal or of any other officer.

The bill is not a proposition to pay him any damages. It is simply based upon the theory that the Government of the United States sold him this property, took his money for it, gave it into his possession, and then through the action of its officers deprived him of it. This is not to give him any damages; it is simply to pay back to him the money which he paid to the Government, for which he has practically received nothing.

The case is an exceptional one. Another like it can hardly occur. There seems to be no good reason why this man should not be reimbursed that purchase-money.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask for the reading of the minority report, retaining the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the views of the minority, submitted May 12, 1886, as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

At the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress a favorable majority report upon this claim was made from the Senate Committee on Claims. The chairman of the committee and myself submitted a minority report, which is as follows:

"The undersigned are unable to agree with the majority of the committee in the foregoing report. In our judgment the fact that the property out of which the claim arose was purchased by the claimant from the United States is wholly immaterial. The sale was valid and passed the title to the property, and it was sustained by the judgment of the court.

"The proceedings for the confiscation of the property commenced by the United States district attorney on behalf of the United States was commenced and prosecuted in pursuance of the general laws of the United States. The principle which would require compensation to be made to the complainant in this case for his loss on account of said judicial proceedings would require compensation to be made in every case to a party against whom an unsuccessful legal proceeding in personam or in rem, civil or criminal, has been or shall be commenced or prosecuted in the name of the United States under the direction of the Department of Justice by any prosecuting officer of the Government in pursuance of the laws of the United States.

"It would be a dangerous precedent, and one which the undersigned are not willing to establish, to hold the Government liable to make compensation for losses caused by the acts of judges, United States attorneys, and ministerial officers of courts of justice. The committee have repeatedly held that the United States is not liable for the mistaken or wrongful acts of its agents.

"J. N. DOLPH.
"ANGUS CAMERON."

Nothing has occurred since to change my views of the case.

J. N. DOLPH.

Mr. DOLPH. This is a case which excites my sympathy, but there are hundreds of cases that come before the Committee on Claims which in like manner enlist the sympathy of the members of the committee. I have met this old gentleman, the claimant. He appears to be a man of character, and he has that reputation among his neighbors.

But there is a principle involved in this case that I think forbids the payment of this claim by the United States. I do not think, from my view of the testimony, it warrants the statement that there is good reason to believe there was a conspiracy between the officers of the court in which the case was tried, which I suppose would be the judge, the clerk, and the district attorney, to deprive the claimant of his property, nor do I think that even if such was the case the United States is liable for their acts.

This property was seized upon due process of law. It was libeled. It was sold by order of the court as perishable property. The proceeds of the sale came into the hands of the United States marshal, and if it was stolen, it was stolen by him or on account of his negligence.

When the United States appoints a United States marshal it requires him to execute a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties, which includes the faithful care of and accounting for moneys which come into his hands officially; and any suitor may bring an action against the marshal and his sureties upon his bond and recover judgment against them for any loss which he sustains by reason of a breach of official duty. Mr. Shepard might have sued this marshal upon his official bond and recovered for the money which was stolen by the marshal or lost through his negligence. It is said in this case, and perhaps truly, that the sureties are insolvent and that nothing could be recovered. That makes a case of hardship, but it does not alter the principle.

It seems to me that to hold the Government liable in this case would be a very dangerous precedent, a precedent committing us to the proposition that with one hundred thousand office-holders in the United States the Government will undertake to make good every loss which occurs to an individual citizen by the malfeasance or negligence of such, notwithstanding there may have been no negligence in the appointment of the officers, the Government requiring the proper bonds for the efficient performance of their duty.

For these reasons I can not agree to the majority report. I do agree that it is rather an exceptional case, but it is not entirely so, because there are many cases of the kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

The bill (S. 778) to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war for the Union was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over. The Senator in charge of it is not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

PATRICK COOK.

The bill (S. 1018) for the relief of Patrick Cook was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Patrick Cook of $1,500, being the amount awarded him by the late board of audit for and on account of damages to his real estate in the city of Washington, one-half of the sum being chargeable to the revenue derived from taxation within the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLACKBURN May 17, 1886:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1018) for the relief of Patrick Cook, having considered the same, report as follows:

That on the 20th of January, 1875, Patrick Cook filed before the board of audit a claim for damages to certain lots belonging to him in the city of Washington, in square No. 24, said damages occasioned by public improvements in excavating Twenty-fourth street, northwest, between M and N streets; and on the 3d of August, 1875, the board of audit, after inspection, awarded to said Patrick Cook the sum of $1,500, that sum being the one-half of the amount claimed by him in his said petition. The said sum of $1,500 was, however, not paid to the said Patrick Cook, for the reason that the board of audit was legislated out of existence before they had prepared and issued to him the necessary certificate; and thus the claim now stands. Your committee think that he should be paid the $1,500 adjudged by the board of audit as due to him, and to that end report the accompanying bill with recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M'NAUGHTON.

The bill (S. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill is reported adversely. I object to it. Let it take its place on the other Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be transferred to the other Calendar.

MAJ. E. A. HANCOCK.

The bill (S. 1822) for the relief of Maj. E. A. Hancock was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That also is reported adversely. Let the same order be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The bill (S. 2436) to amend sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, setting apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park was announced as next in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That had better go over.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. The Territory of Wyoming has hitherto exercised jurisdiction over Yellowstone Park; there has been no other jurisdiction there for the punishment of any crime of any sort. Lately the Territorial Legislature of Wyoming repealed those statutes, so that now this park is entirely without a form of government, and unless this bill can be passed at the present session any crime committed there during the coming summer will be with impunity. That is the whole case. If any Senator sees proper to object to this bill and prevent it from passing the result is apparent.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the report be read subject to objection hereafter.

Mr. VEST. There is no report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are so many of these public parks that interfere with everything else that I want to know what we are doing. I should like to have the bill and the report both read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is no report accompanying the bill. It is substantially the bill that passed the Senate at the last session of Congress and is designed to protect the park.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the matter may go over this morning without prejudice.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think the bill will lead to any debate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to look into it.

Mr. VEST. The Senator said these parks interfered with everything else. I think the Senator alluded to a railroad bill. This does not apply to any railroad at all. It is only to punish murder, robbery, and other crimes which have been committed heretofore.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I was not alluding to railroads especially. There are other reservations of different kinds where it seems the public can not get through. I want to know what we are doing before we make any more reservations.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the objection will not prevent the bill being taken up to-morrow morning, because it is of great importance.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let it be passed over without prejudice until to-morrow morning.

EDWARD D. PATCHIN.

The bill (S. 2455) granting a pension to Edward D. Patchin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Edward D. Patchin, son of Bernard Patchin, late a private in Company B, Forty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

Mr. VEST. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER May 18, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Edward D. Patchin, have examined the same, and report:

The petitioner is a son of Bernard Patchin, who, as shown by the report of the Adjutant-General, was a private in Company B, Forty-first Ohio Volunteers, was enrolled September 30, 1862, died of disease at Nashville, Tenn., January 17, 1863. Officer's certificate shows that he died of typhoid fever contracted in line of duty; that at the time he entered the service he was a young man of good health and habits. The Pension Office records show that the widow and two minor children were pensioned; that the widow remarried in 1865, and that the two sons, Edward D. and Charles B. Patchin, were continued on the roll until the expiration of the time limited for their receiving a pension.

The petitioner now prays for the passage of a special act placing him on the pension-roll by reason of an accident whereby he has been crippled for life, and disqualified for engaging in active employment. He is now about twenty-five years of age, and says he is the only surviving issue of the said Bernard Patchin; that he is not able to perform manual labor, and that he has no means of support.

His identity is established by the testimony of three witnesses, who say he is the only surviving issue of the soldier; that he is hopelessly maimed for life, and that he has no means of support.

In view of his helpless condition, and of his being deprived of support and protection, the committee report the accompanying bill for his relief with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEEL FOR ORDNANCE.

The bill (S. 662) to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern army ordnance, armor, and other army purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern army warfare, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. This bill and the following bill on the Calendar (S. 663) to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern naval ordnance, armor, shafting, and other naval purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern naval warfare, are closely related, and ought to be discussed and acted upon together. They can not be considered under the five-minute rule, I am sure; but I wish them passed over without any prejudice whatever to their rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These two bills will be passed over informally if there be no objection.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The bill (H. R. 807) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. That bill can not be considered under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the bill goes over I wish to say that it is a measure which the whole Chamber has a right to have acted on. When the Senate bill making provisions for the soldiers of the late war went to the House the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] who is not now in his seat proposed to move this bill as an amendment to that, and refrained from so doing under an assurance made by myself in the presence of the Senate, no one objecting, that the Mexican war pension bill would be pressed for a vote as soon as possible at this session, and I shall feel bound to urge it upon the attention of the Senate so that it may be disposed of during the session.

Mr. TELLER. I did not object to it because I wanted it to go over beyond the session. I expect it to be taken up and disposed of during the session.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to state to the Senator from Colorado that if that side of the Chamber is willing to take the bill as reported by the committee I think I can safely say that there is not a Senator on this side of the Chamber who will want to consume one moment in debate.

Mr. TELLER. I understand there are some amendments that Senators propose to offer to the bill which will certainly lead to discussion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the Senator from Colorado will withdraw the objection and let us go on with this bill this morning. I think we can dispose of it, and I think it ought to be disposed of. This is the bill which was agreed upon in the Senate in the last Congress and passed; and if there are amendments to come in, we may as well dispose of them now as at any time. I do hope the Senator will withdraw his objection and let us proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Let it go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, no; let it go on this morning.

Mr. BLAIR. It is the same bill we passed by unanimous consent on this side of the Chamber two years ago.

Mr. TELLER. I withdraw my objection. I only objected because I had been told by certain Senators that they desired to offer amendments. I do not desire to offer any myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being withdrawn, the bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 4, section 1, after the words "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to," to strike out the following words:

Place the names of all the surviving officers, soldiers, and sailors who enlisted and served in the war with Mexico for any period during the years 1845, 1846, 1847, and 1848, and were honorably discharged, and their surviving widows, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act, during their lives.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry this act into effect: Provided, That where it shall appear that a discharge is lost, secondary evidence may be permitted; and where it shall appear an applicant has received a land-warrant, that shall be sufficient evidence of an honorable discharge, unless the evidence shows that he procured it by fraud: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to persons under political disabilities.

Place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States, who, being duly enlisted, actually served sixty days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said war, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become sixty-two years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act; but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

SEC. 2. That pensions under section 1 of this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, and payable only from and after the passage of this act, for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto, or during the continuance of the disability for which the same shall be granted: Provided, That section 1 of this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month.

SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension-roll under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, of the right of the applicant to a pension; and any person who shall falsely and corruptly take any oath required under this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the pension-roll the name of any person whenever it shall be made to appear by proof satisfactory to him that such name was put upon such roll through false and fraudulent representations, and that such person is not entitled to a pension under this act. The loss of the certificate of discharge shall not deprive any person of the benefits of this act, but other record evidence of enlistment and service and of an honorable discharge may be deemed sufficient: Provided, That when any person has been granted a land-warrant, under any act of Congress, for and on account of service in the said war with Mexico, such grant shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land-warrant was improperly granted.

SEC. 4. That the pension laws now in force which are not inconsistent or in conflict with this act are hereby made a part of this act, so far as they may be applicable thereto.

SEC. 5. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person while under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. What is the section repealed?

Mr. BLAIR. The section repealed is this:

SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

That is repealed, but the act contains a provision that no person shall be pensioned whose disability was contracted in opposition to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Is that repealed absolutely, or only so far as it affects this act? Let that clause be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The repealing clause will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read section 5 of the amendment of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the title be amended to conform to the body of the bill; and then I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the title will be amended so as to read as will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] moves that the Senate insist on its amendment, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. BLAIR, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. WHITTHORNE were appointed.

STATE OF GEORGIA.

The bill (S. 2457) for the relief of the State of Georgia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have an amendment I wish to offer to that bill, and I ask that it may go over without prejudice until to-morrow. I am not quite ready with the amendment yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

JOSEPH H. MADDOX AND OTHERS.

The consideration of the bill (S. 565) for the relief of Joseph H. Maddox and others was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after the name "Maddox," Mr. COCKRELL moved to strike out "and his associates" and insert "Benjamin F. Camp and D. P. Parr, parties of the one part;" after the word "with," in the same line, to insert "H. A. Risley;" and, after the word "Treasury," in line 6, to insert "dated November 13, 1864, and sanctioned by President Lincoln on November 17, 1864;" so as to read:

That all matters in relation to the agreement of Joseph H. Maddox, Benjamin F. Camp, and D. P. Parr, parties of the one part, made with H. A. Risley, the supervising agent of the Treasury, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated November 13, 1864, and sanctioned by President Lincoln on November 17, 1864, for the delivery of tobacco and other property, under the permit, safeguard, and orders of the President of the United States, are hereby referred to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department for determination upon the evidence taken and now on file in the office of the clerk of the United States Court of Claims and the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. INGALLS. This bill was reported without amendment, as appears by the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been under consideration before, and the Senator from Missouri offered this amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some time ago the bill was up, and I offered the amendment which has just been read at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas desire the whole bill to be read again?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. I do not care whether this bill is read or explained. This refers the whole matter to the Treasury Department, and it does not say whether the claim is to be paid by the Department or to come to Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; it says "directed to adjust, settle, and pay to the said Joseph H. Maddox," &c. I should like to hear the bill read again.

Mr. CONGER. It is a bill relating to captured and abondoned property.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. CONGER. Let it go over until to-morrow. I wish to examine the report, and perhaps I shall have no objection to it. Let it hold its place on the Calendar until to-morrow.

SAMUEL NOBLE.

The consideration of the bill (S. 2475) for the relief of Samuel Noble was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment was heretofore offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is, after the word "evidence," in line 18, to strike out "both for and against the said claim and to render final judgment" and insert "and report the same to Congress;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That Samuel Noble, formerly of Rome, Ga., but now a citizen of Anniston, in the State of Alabama, may, notwithstanding the decision heretofore made and the law of the statute by lapse of time, prosecute his claim to the net proceeds of sale of 802 bales of cotton alleged to have been captured by the United States military authorities at Savannah, Ga., in December, 1864, before the Court of Claims, under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned or captured property and the prevention of frauds in the insurrectionary districts of the United States," approved March 12, 1863, and this act; and the said claim of said Samuel Noble is hereby referred to the said Court of Claims, with all the papers on file in Congress relating thereto, with full power to hear evidence, and report the same to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH H. MADDOX AND OTHERS.

Mr. CONGER. In reference to the bill (S. 565) for the relief of Joseph H. Maddox and others, I am informed that it is a reference to the Treasury for adjustment and for report to Congress. If that be so, I withdraw the request to have it go over till to-morrow if it does not make an appropriation for the payment of the claim, and I am assured that that is the fact. If it is not so, I will renew the objection.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I think there is a little misapprehension in regard to it. I ask to have the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the bill does make a direct appropriation from the Treasury.

Mr. CONGER. Then let it go until to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I will state in a word that it simply directs the Secretary of the Treasury to adjudicate the matter and pay whatever amount is found due.

Mr. CONGER. Then let it go over.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It is a similar case to the one just passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case will be stated.

REMOVAL OF EASTERN CHEROKEES.

The bill (S. 1799) for the removal of the Eastern Cherokee Indians to the Indian Territory was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHACE. That had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

AMENDMENT OF COPYRIGHT LAW.

The bill (S. 2496) to amend title 60, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

BONDS OF EXECUTORS.

The consideration of the bill (H. R. 7879) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill I think is in charge of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. There were objections urged.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be informally passed over. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] wanted to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont is at the desk with the bill. Shall it be read?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, I did not know the amendment had been offered

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

That any will hereafter executed devising real estate in the District of Columbia from which it shall appear that it was the intention of the testator to devise property acquired after the execution of the will shall be deemed, taken, and held to operate as a valid devise of all such property.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ARMS AND STORES TO DAKOTA TERRITORY.

The bill (S. 2249) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the Territory of Dakota with certain sums for ordnance and ordnance stores issued to said Territory, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. There are two bills of the same character; let them go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill and the next bill (S. 2035) will go over.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the Senator will not object to the next bill, which has been called on the Calendar several times. It is simply to credit the State of Oregon with a sum of money for arms used in the Nez Percé war. The bill meets the approval of the Chief of Ordnance and the War Department, and I do not think there can be any possible objection to it. There is a report which explains it fully.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2249) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the Territory of Dakota with certain sums for ordnance and ordnance stores issued to said Territory, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the preamble. The Chair calls attention to the fact that there is a blank in the preamble that ought to be filled. It seems to be an informal matter, but it ought to be filled.

Mr. MANDERSON. The bill was reported by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The preamble will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the preamble, as follows:

Whereas it appears from the records of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department that the Territory of Dakota stands charged with the sum of $38,625 for ordnance and ordnance stores issued to said Territory during the year 1867, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 7, 1866, entitled "An act to provide arms and ammunition for the defense of the inhabitants of Dakota Territory," and the then governor of said Territory, to wit, ——— ———, stands charged therewith and with said amount, all of said ordnance and ordnance stores having been drawn by the Territory of Dakota and used for the purpose of aiding the General Government in the protection of the borders of said Territory against Indian invasions and depredations; and

Whereas said ordnance was issued to the inhabitants of said Territory as in said act directed, and all of the same has been lost and rendered useless in the service: Therefore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words "to wit" might be stricken out, which would make sense without inserting the name of the governor.

Mr. MANDERSON. I make that motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

ARMS AND STORES TO OREGON AND WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 2035) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the State of Oregon with the sum of $12,398.55, for ordnance and ordnance stores to be issued to the Territory of Washington on account of said State, in payment for ordnance and ordnance stores borrowed by said State of said Territory during the Nez Percé Indian war of 1877 and 1878, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report in that case.

Mr. CONGER. We can not take up all the morning on it.

Mr. MANDERSON. The report is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MANDERSON May 25, 1886:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2035) "to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the State of Oregon with the sum of $12,398.55 for ordnance and ordnance stores to be issued to the Territory of Washington on account of said State, in payment for ordnance and ordnance stores borrowed by said State of said Territory during the Nez Perces Indian war of 1877 and 1878, and for other purposes," have had the bill under consideration, and report the same back favorably and recommend its passage.

During the Nez Perces Indian war in 1877 and 1878 the governor of Oregon called out the volunteer troops and State militia in defense of the people of Eastern Oregon and to suppress the uprising of the Indians. The State of Oregon at this time did not have at its command the necessary arms and accouterments to equip the militia and volunteers called out, and was forced to borrow of the Territory of Washington the following ordnance and ordnance stores: 320 breech-loading Springfield rifles, caliber .50, model of 1866; 262 breech-loading Springfield rifles, caliber .50, model of 1868; 582 screw-drivers, 47,445 ball cartridges, caliber .50, and 31 arm-chests.

Washington Territory has recently made a demand upon the State of Oregon for a return of the ordnance and stores so borrowed for the purposes aforesaid, but most of the same has been lost or is useless and it is not in the power of Oregon to return the same, and that State remains indebted on the books of the Ordnance Department to the Territory therefor in the sum of $12,398.55, to cancel which Oregon has but $10.98 to her credit.

The situation of Oregon is such as to have exposed that State to repeated Indian raids, and her people have suffered from uprisings and depredations to such an extent that the General Government can well afford to make good this demand of Washington Territory upon her. It has often happened that the resistance which Oregon has made was no less in defense of her own territory than of the country touching her borders, and the General Government has not been as liberal in the distribution of ordnance in her behalf as it has with Washington Territory.

An examination of the acts of July 3, 1876, and of May 16, 1878, and June 7, 1878, shows that Washington Territory received two thousand arms and one hundred thousand cartridges, while Oregon received only half of that allowance. Oregon is to-day without the ordnance supplies necessary to properly and effectively equip her militia, and yet the brunt of a defense of the people of the far Northwest against Indians would fall upon that State. Several companies of militia have recently been organized in the State, and the dictates of economy and common prudence, no less than a regard for the lives of a large population exposed to Indian raids, suggest that Oregon be placed in a position to dispense—in any emergency—with the support of Government forces, always expensive and many times ineffectual because of the time occupied in the transportation of regular troops from long distances to the scene of hostilities.

In the judgment of your committee it is both wise and humane to place Oregon and Washington Territory in a position to protect themselves against Indian raids, which can be best done by a well-equipped force of militia.

Your committee accordingly report the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass, and annex hereto communications from the Secretary of War and the Chief of Ordnance, which they ask may be made a part of this report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The thing I want to hear is the communication from the War Department.

The Secretary read the letters of the Secretary of War and of the Chief of Ordnance, appended to the report, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, May 19, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, inclosing for the views of this Department Senate bill 2035, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, to authorize the State of Oregon to be credited with the sum of $12,398.55, for ordnance and ordnance stores to be issued to Washington Territory in payment for those loaned by the latter to the former during the Nez Percé Indian war; and also inclosing a letter on the subject, dated the 19th of March last, from the governor of Oregon.

In reply, I beg to inclose a letter of the 17th instant from the Chief of Ordnance, in which he expresses the opinion that the object of this bill is proper and just and recommends its passage.

I concur in the views of the Chief of Ordnance.

The letter from the governor of Oregon is herewith returned, in accordance with your request.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. C. F. MANDERSON,
Of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to return letter of Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON, inclosing S. 2035, "to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the State of Oregon with the sum of $12,398.55 for ordnance and ordnance stores to be issued to the Territory of Washington on account of said State, in payment of ordnance and ordnance stores borrowed by said State of said Territory during the Nez Perce Indian war of 1877 and 1878, and for other purposes," and also letter of the governor of Oregon bearing on the subject, and to report:

There is no doubt that arms and other ordnance stores to the money value of $12,398.55 were loaned to the State of Oregon by the Territory of Washington to enable the former to aid in suppressing Indian hostilities during the Nez Percé war of 1877 and 1878. The State of Oregon is unable to return the arms, &c., which were lost and destroyed during said service, and believing that the loss and destruction resulted from frontier service during said war, I think that the object of this bill is proper and just, and do recommend its passage.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the result of this will or will not be that the Territory of Washington will have or make any claim against the United States for these arms to the amount of $12,000 that she loaned to the State of Oregon?

Mr. MANDERSON. It was impossible for me to hear the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My inquiry was whether or not the result of the passage of this bill relieving the State of Oregon from the responsibility for these arms will or will not be that the United States will have to make up or will be called upon to make up a similar amount to the Territory of Washington, from whom the arms came?

Mr. MANDERSON. That would be a duplicate allowance, which I do not think is contemplated by this bill.

Mr. DOLPH. The provision of this bill is that the arms are to be issued to Washington and Oregon credited with the amount. They are to be issued on the credit of Oregon, but they are issued to Washington.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The arms are to be replaced in the Territory of Washington by Congress then, and Oregon is to be credited with them?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, sir. In other words, the United States pays the debt of Oregon for these arms that were lost and destroyed and can not now be returned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And leaves Oregon with a claim for her proportion of arms, irrespective of those that were issued to her?

Mr. DOLPH. She has but $10 to her credit, and in fact not that, because at my request, owing to a recent necessity for arms, the Secretary of War has advanced arms to Oregon; but at the time the letter was written she had but $10 to her credit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The result of the operation will be that Oregon will get to the extent of those furnished by Washington Territory, valued at $12,000, more than her proportion would be under the general law of distribution among the States.

Mr. DOLPH. That is so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you would treat the State of Vermont in the same way I should be glad.

Mr. DOLPH. If the State of Vermont had lost arms anywhere by her citizens volunteering I should be glad to do it.

Mr. INGALLS. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska why the difference in the terms of the issue that appear in the bills granting relief to the Territory of Dakota and to the State of Oregon? The Territory of Dakota is required to return to the Secretary of War "all such arms and other ordnance stores remaining in the custody of the said Territory of the issues thereof under said act;" but there is no requirement in the bill for the relief of Oregon that the arms shall be returned. It seems as if there had been unjustifiable conditions imposed upon Dakota, if I can judge by the language of this bill; that is to say, the Territory of Dakota is required to do something that the State of Oregon is released from. It seems to me the terms ought to be the same, as these bills come in consecutive order and relate to exactly the same subject; and if Dakota is to be required to return the arms and ordnance, the State of Oregon ought to be required to do the same thing.

Mr. MANDERSON. I know nothing of the report in the case of the Territory of Dakota. The report in the case of the Territory of Dakota was made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], so as to that I know but little. I do know in regard to this, of the loss of the arms which the State of Oregon borrowed from Washington Territory a great many years ago, at the time of the Nez Percé war. I think the letter of the governor of that State shows that all those arms have disappeared and none of them are within the control or reach of the adjutant-general or governor of that State. Certainly there can be no objection, if any of these arms can be collected, to their being turned over. I would not object to that clause in the bill, though I think it would be useless and futile not only in the case of Oregon, but probably in the case of the Territory of Dakota.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. In connection with the bill just passed, I ask unanimous consent to have a letter from the governor of Oregon in regard to the matter printed in connection with my previous remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hearing no objection, that order will be made.

The letter is as follows:

STATE OF OREGON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, Salem, May 22, 1886.

SIR: Hon. J. N. DOLPH has inclosed to my address your letter of the 11th instant addressed to him, and relating to the bill recently introduced by him in the United States Senate, authorizing the Secretary of War to credit Oregon with the sum of $12,398.55 on her ordnance account.

Permit me to make a brief statement showing the importance of the passage of this bill to the State of Oregon.

It is doubtful whether any State or Territory in the Union has suffered so much within the past fifteen years from Indian depredations as the State of Oregon. The Modoc war of 1872-'73 entailed the most serious loss of life and property. The wars, however, which during that period of fifteen years assumed the widest range were those of 1877 and 1878, menacing, as they did, a very large expanse of territory in Eastern Oregon. In the war of 1878 the Indians ravaged the country wherever they went, and produced the greatest alarm among the settlers of what was then a comparatively sparsely settled district. The greatest excitement prevailed, and the demand for arms and ammunition was constant and urgent, and the supply was absolutely inadequate to meet the urgent needs of the time. It was necessary to call on the militia companies of Western Oregon to transfer their arms and accouterments to newly organized companies in the district threatened by the enemy. The arms thus obtained were insufficient, and the governor of Washington Territory was thereupon called upon for assistance. In response to the urgent request of the governor of this State, Washington Territory loaned the State of Oregon arms and equipments, as follows: three hundred and twenty breech-loading Springfield rifles, caliber .50, model 1866; 262 breech-loading Springfield rifles, caliber .50, model 1868; 582 screw-drivers; 47,445 ball cartridges, caliber .50; 31 arms-chests.

All of the arms and equipments were issued to companies and individuals as soon as received. It was found necessary in many instances to make issue of arms and ammunition to individuals in remote and exposed parts of the invaded territory, where the surroundings were such that companies could not act with efficiency and the service of scouts was required. It is believed that ordinary care and prudence was exercised in the distribution of the arms, and in the subsequent collection of such as were of any value after the close of these wars. Earnest effort has certainly been made to gather up all munitions belonging to the State, but during the progress of hostilities many arms were lost, destroyed, and rendered useless, and when a final inventory was taken the State had virtually nothing with which to properly equip her militia. Such munitions as she has since received have not been adequate to her rapidly increasing wants. A number of our militia companies are without equipments of any kind, and but few of them are properly equipped. The quota now due the State from the General Government is exhausted, with our indebtedness to Washington Territory still outstanding. To meet that indebtedness this State has given an order upon the War Department in favor of Washington Territory. This will exhaust Oregon's quota for years to come. Aside from this, new militia companies are needed in various portions of our State, and are being organized, but they are discouraged with the prospect that is before them of not securing proper equipments.

When you consider the fact that Oregon is a frontier State, embracing an immense expanse of territory that is rapidly increasing in population, and further, that peculiar conditions operate here, calculated at times to render the enforcement of law a somewhat difficult task, the necessity of a well-organized and properly equipped militia will be apparent. As we think we have already clearly shown, the end desired can not be secured as we are at present situated.

In view of these facts we respectfully urge upon you a favorable consideration of the bill of Senator DOLPH above referred to.

Respectfully submitted.

B. F. MOODY, Governor of Oregon.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 325) granting a pension to Catharine Waters;

A bill (H. R. 9726) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 181) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Southwestern Iowa and Northwestern Missouri Veteran Soldiers' Association, at Bethany, Mo., and to the Tri-State Veterans' Association of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, for reunion purposes.

RAILROAD ATTORNEYS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to make a report at this time. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grant of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States, direct me to report the bill favorably with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to have the substitute read at length.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to state that while I am in favor of the substitute as compared with the original bill as an amendment, and in favor of the passage of some legislation on the subject, I prefer the substitute which I now send to the desk as an amendment that may be offered hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar. The Chair is of opinion that all these motions interposed during the consideration of the Calendar under the present special order are in violation of the plain words of the order. Nothing can be interposed; but the Chair receives them by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Texas wishes to make a minority report.

Mr. COKE. In behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and myself I desire to say that the minority dissent from the report made by the Senator from Massachusetts for the majority of the committee, and to say further that the minority will at the proper time offer a substitute for the bill presented by the majority. I ask that the substitute be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The various amendments will be printed and the bill placed on the Calendar.

GENERAL AND LIEUTENANT-GENERAL.

The bill (S. 1964) to repeal a certain portion of section 1094 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may go over. It wants consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over under objection.

PEREZ DICKINSON.

Mr. DOLPH. On the 9th instant the bill (S. 2162) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson, was reported from the Committee on Claims by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. I had prepared a minority report and handed it to him to be submitted with the majority report; but the report was submitted in his absence by his colleague for him and the minority report was not presented with it. I now submit the views of the minority to be printed with the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order to print will be made. The Chair hears none.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill (H. R. 9726) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 10th instant approved and signed the act (S. 503) relating to the supreme court of Montana Territory, and providing for the establishment of judicial districts in said Territory.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, in section 1, to insert the clauses from line 1134 to line 1174, inclusive, as amended.

CUSTOMS FRAUDS AT NEW YORK.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may put a question to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] which relates to a matter pending before the Finance Committee, which is of very great importance and interest to my constituents, and which they would like to be informed as to the condition of.

Before the Christmas holidays the Senate directed an investigation into the matter of the fraudulent undervaluation alleged to have taken place in the New York custom-house, by which some very well-informed and cautious persons think an amount in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 a year is lost to the United States in duties, and also that trade is unnaturally and improperly diverted from other importing ports, especially Boston and Baltimore and Philadelphia, to New York, because of the facility of making importations at less than the proper duties, and also, indirectly, very great injury is inflicted upon the manufacturers, whose protection is destroyed in this way.

I understand that a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance was appointed just after the holidays to consider that question; and it would be of great importance to the public, especially to the merchants of Boston and the manufacturers of Massachusetts and other New England States, to be informed as to the condition of that investigation, if the Senator from Iowa can give us the information.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance was charged with the duty of making the investigation of which the Senator from Massachusetts speaks. We undertook the work and took a considerable amount of testimony, making a journey to Boston and one or two journeys to New York for the purpose. I believe myself, and I think the subcommittee that made the investigation share with me in that belief, that the embarrassments and difficulties are not so great as the Boston merchants seem to think, although the committee believe that there are great abuses in the valuation of goods at the New York custom-house and have been for some time; but I think the committee also believe that the fault is primarily in the system now existing in the New York custom-house with reference to the method of valuation. The present system is one that has existed for many years.

It is totally inefficient in its organization; and the committee have had under consideration the question of entirely changing the official staff engaged in the valuation of merchandise and enlarging the board of appraisers; but the first difficulty we encountered when we came to prepare a bill looking to the alteration of the law was the fact that, in making an efficient law on this subject, we should be obliged to infringe upon the prerogative of the House of Representatives. To make a complete system of valuation of goods requires that some supervising authority shall not only control the valuation, but the classification of goods; and the moment we get into the question of classification we get into the question of the rates of duty.

So the committee, after progressing some time in this way, on consultation with gentlemen in the other House who had the same question under consideration with regard to regulating the New York custom-house, concluded to await the action of the other House. We supposed then that what is known as the Hewitt administration bill would pass at this session. That expectation has so far been disappointed, and probably that bill will not pass.

I believe, however, it is the purpose of the Committee on Finance to continue this investigation during the vacation, if it can be done, and try and make some report to the Senate early in the next session, changing the entire administration of the appraiser's office.

That is about the condition of the affair. It seems to me there can be no effective reform in the New York custom-house until that is done.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say that the merchants, the Board of Trade of Boston, and other business men there, to whom this subject is of very great interest and concern, will endeavor, I believe, to have such a measure as their business experience suggests framed and submitted to that committee for its consideration, which may possibly be some help to them hereafter.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Boston Board of Trade have already submitted a very elaborate project for a change of the law with reference to the appraisal of goods and have furnished very valuable information on that subject. We shall be glad, of course, to have them furnish further information if they can do so.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion which I heretofore submitted to reconsider the action of the Senate on the bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his motion to reconsider?

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. INGALLS. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook? If there be no objection the motion to reconsider is withdrawn, and the bill will be returned to the House of Representatives.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, in section 1, to insert the clauses from line 1134 to line 1174, inclusive, as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not know that I desire to occupy the time of the Senate in the discussion of the amendment now pending. I have been so occupied in committee duties that I have not even heard the discussions pro and con with reference to it, and have not followed them up perhaps as I should have done; but I intend to vote for the amendment, and I believe that it is as important a provision as there is in this bill, and that with perhaps three or four exceptions there can be no more meritorious appropriation than the one proposed by the pending amendment.

It seems to me that Senators do not fully comprehend the scope of this provision. They have gone off upon a side question rather than speak of what I consider the main question involved here. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who spoke the other day, stated objections to this amendment because it proposed the construction of a cross-canal through the State of Illinois. That is only a part of this project, as I understand it. The main object involved in this amendment is to make a water communication between the Mississippi River and the great system of Northwestern lakes. And so I think the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] misapprehended the action of the Legislature of the State of Illinois when he criticised the Legislature of that State because they imposed conditions upon the General Government with reference to the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

It is a matter of so much moment, not only to the people of Illinois but to all the people who trade between the Mississippi River and the great system of Northwestern lakes, that that canal shall be an open water way, that Illinois could not consent to its transfer to the Government of the United States unless the Government of the United States would use it for the purpose for which it was originally intended; and if the United States does not take the canal and enlarge it, as it should be enlarged, to a ship-canal, I have no doubt that public opinion in the State of Illinois will at some time compel its enlargement through the operation of State laws.

This action of the Legislature of the State of Illinois was taken in pursuance of a debate in this Chamber which I remember perfectly well, when some years ago the Senate Committee on Commerce introduced an amendment like this to a river and harbor bill, and it was supported here and received a large majority of the votes of this body. At that time it was contended by those who opposed the provision for the Hennepin Canal that we were building a short canal 64 miles long to connect with a line a hundred miles long which was wholly under the control of the State of Illinois, and Senators were unwilling to make a free canal 64 miles in length when the State of Illinois had it in its power through its Legislature to exact such tolls upon that interstate commerce in its transmission through that State as it chose.

So the gentlemen who then stood in this Chamber opposing this work said, "Before you come to ask Congress to make this appropriation to connect the Mississippi River with the lakes you must come here with the State of Illinois having relinquished to the General Government its right to charge tolls upon this hundred miles of canal." I think the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] was then governor of that State; and I remember perfectly well—I do not know that he does—of transmitting to him those debates, and saying to him in a communication that it was necessary for the State of Illinois to relinquish to the General Government its canal of 100 miles in length before a measure could be successful in passing Congress for the purpose of making this water way between the Mississippi and the lakes; that Congress never would consent to appropriate money to complete this water way as long as the State of Illinois stood in its pathway with a power of exacting tolls upon that commerce.

So, then, the action of the Legislature of the State of Illinois was in direct response to the popular will as expressed in this Chamber with respect to this great water way. Now what is it? The primary object of this improvement is not the Hennepin Canal. I submit to Senators that the main project is to connect the Mississippi River with the system of Northwestern lakes, whereby vessels can be transported from the Mississippi River through this canal to the lakes, and thus cheapen the entire transportation of that region. And this is no new scheme. It has been the dream of men who have studied the subject of water-transportation for more than fifty years. It was the dream, I believe, of the first white man who passed through that region, whose name is now given to one of the cities on the line of the Illinois River. More than two hundred years ago he predicted that there would be a continuous water way from the foot of Lake Michigan to the city of New Orleans. I venture the statement that no other civilized government on earth would have seen this great opportunity of connecting the Mississippi River and its tributaries with the great chain of Northwestern lakes without long since availing of it except the Government of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, during some of the years of war I happened to be a member of the other House, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] was a member, and it was then debated at great length whether or not this Government should not take hold of this canal and build a water way there sufficient for the transportation of vessels of war. And, sir, some of the men who now listen to me will see the day when vessels of war will be transported from the Northwestern lakes into the Mississippi River through this water way called the Illinois and Michigan Canal down to the Gulf. If we were not as secure as we are with reference to the intrusion of outside governments our Government would not hesitate one moment as a war measure to incur this expense of two or three or four million dollars.

This is the great object in view in this amendment, as I understand. It is to place this Government in a situation whereby it can connect the great system of river communication extending from Saint Paul and up the Missouri River and up the Ohio and up the Tennessee and up the Cumberland and up the Arkansas with the Northwestern lakes.

Mr. President, there is no single State in this Union that is more directly interested in that than is the State of Missouri, which the Senator from Missouri represents. Here stands the city of Chicago at the foot of this system of lake navigation, and here is the city of Saint Louis in the very heart and center and pivotal point of the river navigation. Now, is it not worth while for these two great cities to have water communication and water connection with each other? Here is a city of 800,000 people and another of 400,000 or 500,000 people, with four lines of railways built between these two cities; and what does that indicate? It indicates that there is a great commerce between them, that there is a great communication between them; and yet here is an opportunity with a small expenditure amounting to only a few million dollars which will enable all the people of the Mississippi Valley to communicate with all the people upon the lakes; and yet the Senator from Missouri says he is not in favor of this project.

The reason these water communications are made is that there is a certain class of products necessary to the comfort and convenience of the people that will not bear the cost of railway transportation. Take the iron ore of Lake Superior, if you please, which when mixed and mingled with the iron ore of Missouri makes the most valuable product known to commerce; and yet everybody knows that it is not possible to gather these two classes of ores together by means of railway communication.

What is true with reference to iron is true with reference to coal, and it is true with reference to other bulky products that we are compelled to use west of the Mississippi River, and which can hardly bear the cost of railway transportation. Take the anthracite coal of Pennsylvania; it is burned in every county in my State, I believe. How is it transported? Does any one believe that it can be transported by rail from the mines where it is produced into the interior of Iowa? It is the fact that we have water communication by canal and lake and river that enables us to consume the coal at all. Take the great salt production of Michigan, which is transported by water to the city of Chicago, and sold in the city of Chicago at $5 a ton. When it reaches the interior of Iowa this salt is sold by the bushel; yet if we had communication between the region of the salt production and the region of its great consumption, where the people of Iowa, and of Kansas, and the other interior States are, it does not need a great amount of knowledge of arithmetic to see that the consumer would be able to receive this product, necessary and essential, at a much less price.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the permission of my friend from Iowa, I wish to get information about this. I should like to know how high is the summit-level of this canal above Lake Michigan?

Mr. ALLISON. Which canal does the Senator refer to?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The one which we are to buy and pay for and build.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not expect to go into details. The Illinois and Michigan Canal, as I understand, is in its chief length lower than Lake Michigan. Am I not right?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the feeder is to be Lake Michigan.

Mr. ALLISON. The feeder of the Illinois and Michigan Canal to some extent is doubtless Lake Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any other possible feeder to feed the canal for which Congress gave lands, &c., that is supposed to lead from Chicago to the Illinois River?

Mr. ALLISON. There is the Des Plaines River, of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Des Plaines is a branch of the Illinois, is it not?

Mr. ALLISON. The Des Plaines River, as I understand, runs into Lake Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you get from the Des Plaines River onto the waters that descend into the Mississippi?

Mr. CULLOM. It is impossible to hear the Senator from Vermont in this part of the Hall.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, has it come to this, that we are discussing the question whether there is water to be put into this canal? If that is an open question——

Mr. INGALLS. That is the very question.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that the question which troubles the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing troubles me. I am too old to be troubled. I am merely trying to get information.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to say that the Chicago River, which empties into Lake Michigan, connects with the Illinois and Michigan Canal. Instead of the Chicago River running into Lake Michigan it runs into the canal, and it is fed from Lake Michigan through the Chicago River and the Des Plaines River. The canal runs into the Illinois River at Hennepin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then Lake Michigan is the feeder.

Mr. LOGAN. Lake Michigan is the feeder of the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that the water of Lake Michigan would run into the Mississippi?

Mr. LOGAN. The feeder for the Hennepin Canal is the Mississippi River in part, and one of the main feeders is the Rock River, which runs down on the elevation of which we have heard, and connects with the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long is that feeder?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember the distance.

Mr. CULLOM. About 30 miles.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a short distance. It depends on where the river is tapped, so far as the gentleman talking about feeding the canal with water is concerned. It can be tapped at a number of places. I do not want to disturb the Senator from Iowa any further.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Illinois, because the Senator from Vermont asked me these questions of details with reference to the water, &c., of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and I am not familiar with the details; but I never heard it questioned. I never heard anybody suggest that there was not ample water to build a canal as deep and as wide as you choose to build it between Lake Michigan and the Illinois River. It has always been understood that there is water capacity and opportunity to build a canal there which will float the war ships of this Government that can be floated into the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to suggest to him that a complete answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Vermont is in the fact that the question is one primarily of engineering skill, and, of course, if the engineers do not advise Congress that it is practicable to make the canal the money will not be spent. That is a complete answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not call it a very complete one, with great respect to my friend from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to know why it is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because I think when Congress is asked to initiate a scheme of this kind, which may be a very good one—though I do not know why it is in this river and harbor bill—the first inquiry that anybody who is asked to do anything about building the canal is to know whether at the highest point it has to pass there is water enough to feed it, because you can not feed it from below.

Mr. BUTLER. The engineers certainly would not advise Congress to adopt a canal that can not be supplied by water.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we were projecting a railroad or private canal we should first inquire, without troubling ourselves too much about engineers, whether the summit-level had any water on it.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the engineers have so reported.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to everybody, because I did not wish to occupy time; I only wanted to get at the fact.

Mr. CULLOM. My colleague stated exactly the fact as to the supply of water for the present canal, the Illinois and Michigan Canal, being fed by the Chicago River and the lake and the Des Plaines River. Then as to the Hennepin portion of the canal, the Senator from Iowa knows that the water necessary to run that comes from Rock River at about the point of the summit.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not yet touched upon that branch of the subject relating to the Hennepin Canal. I wanted to clear up the idea with reference to a water way by means of the expansion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the Illinois River. For what are we voting here year by year to improve the Illinois River? Have we not the intention ultimately of securing all the benefits of that appropriation by means of a water communication between the lakes and the river?

This scheme of connecting the Mississippi River and the great Northwestern lakes is without a parallel in this bill. I have seen over and over again, in reading the pages of the bill, propositions looking to improvement of short rivers, only a few miles long, and the extension of improvements. Only the other day we kept in the bill a proposition to accept the improvement of the Muskingum River in the State of Ohio, a small open river in that State having no connection, as this great improvement has, with the system of water navigation connecting a dozen or more States in the Northwest and Northeast.

So I submit there is no question involved in this bill of such magnitude and importance to the people of the United States, and all of them, as this proposition to connect the Illinois River with the great Northwestern lakes by means of the Illinois and Michigan Canal; and that is what we mean when we propose to take this canal from the State of Illinois and enlarge it.

I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri that canals are fast running out of date and out of use. So far from that being true, there is not a country on the globe to-day that is not expending many millions of dollars in the construction and enlargement of canals. There has been a project for the construction of a ship-canal connecting the ocean with the city of Manchester, 50 miles from the ocean. To-day England is utilizing every canal that she has ever built in competition with her railways; France is enlarging her entire system of canal navigation; and Germany is building canals everywhere. Canals form a part of the system of water communication of those countries and every other country.

What is it that has built up Southern Germany? It is the fact that by a system of improvement of her canals and the enlargement of the Rhine the city of Cologne has become practically a seaboard city. So every civilized government on earth is utilizing her water ways by connecting rivers and lakes by means of canals in order that the bulky products which are produced in every country may be transported more cheaply than they can be transported by rail. That is all there is in this project.

When you come to the Hennepin Canal, that is a short canal, 64 miles long, which connects the Upper Mississippi River with the water navigation of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and gives us a near and direct route to Chicago. It is perfectly well known that such a canal is feasible; that it can be built; that it can be utilized; that there is an ample supply of water to build it; and that the entire cost will not exceed $6,000,000, and if one route is taken, five and a half millions of dollars.

It is worth while for us to consider whether or not we will engage in that project. I believe it is a wise thing to do. I believe it is a more wise thing to do than to do many things which I see in this bill, and why? Because by doing it you will cheapen the transportation of the wheat, corn, and other bulky products which are produced in four or five States of the Northwest. You will cheapen the cost of the transportation of these products. I shall not enter into a discussion with my friend from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] as to whether that reduction in the cost of the transportation of those products is most to the interest of the consumer or of the producer, or whether, as some persons believe, in the long run of affairs, in casting up finally both the consumer and producer are benefited by these arrangements. But if these products can be more cheaply transported it is perfectly certain that either the consumer or the producer, or both, will be benefited by that cheapening process. So it affects not only the things which we produce, but the things which we are compelled to consume and which we can not produce, or at least which we do not produce. Certainly we can not produce salt; we can not produce anthracite coal, yet we have long and rigorous winters, requiring the burning of coal for six or seven months, and anything that cheapens the cost of the transportation of that article to our homes west of the Mississippi River is a boon to us. So it is a question whether we shall expend this five and a half million dollars for that purpose. In my belief, it will result in an annual saving of more than its entire cost. I may be mistaken in that——

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa, in view of the fact that low-priced freights are compelling a very great increase in the carrying capacity of vessels, so that even to-day they are building schooners of 1,500 tons burden, and all vessels for transportation are increasing year by year in size on account of the low-priced freights, whether he believes it is prudent or economical for the United States now to enter upon the building of a canal which will cost $5,000,000, with a width of 80 feet, a depth of 7 feet, and a capacity to float only a vessel of 280 tons?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer that question, and I will say most unquestionably so. It is not expected that the Mississippi River craft and the craft that come into these canals will go along the lakes and meander through to the seaboard. It is expected that there will be a breaking of bulk at Chicago. The Senator has given me an argument why this canal ought to be built in the fact that when we get to Chicago there will be cheap water communication, cheapening every year and almost every month in the year. What we want is to amplify and enlarge that cheapening in order that we may also get our products to Chicago cheaper than we can do now by rail.

Does anybody believe that the Government of the United States would consent to the closing of the Erie Canal? I saw a statement only a day or two ago that the tonnage of that canal is much larger this year than last. That canal is a regulator. It fixes the rate of freight on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway, 500 miles away from it. It fixes the rate on the Baltimore and Ohio Railway. So if we can have this canal which we propose, connecting the Mississippi River with the lakes, it will be a regulator of all the railways running between the Mississippi River and the lakes for a range of four or five hundred miles. Is it not worth five and a half million dollars to do that? Who believes that the Welland Canal will ever be closed? Who doubts that the Welland Canal is a boon to the producers and consumers of the United States as it is a boon to the Dominion of Canada, which has built it with its own money and which keeps it in repair?

Senators must remember that if we are to prosper in our interior commerce we must do as the older nations have done and are doing. We must expand and extend our water ways in order to utilize them as a common system.

Why is it that we do not charge tolls upon our rivers and harbors? It is because in the nature of things these rivers and harbors must be open to all the commerce that traverses them; and if we can open the canals in the same way, they become a part of the great system of water communication between different portions of our country.

It is only a question, and I agree it is a fair question, for Senators to decide whether at this moment of time we are able as a government to embark in a national work, to be completed perhaps within five or ten years, which, when completed, will be worth more annually than its entire cost.

I am not to be led astray by the suggestions of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] when he proposes that the Government shall enter upon the experiment of building a governmental railway. I am willing that that experiment shall be tried in Connecticut, but I do not want to begin that method of connecting the great system of the Northwestern lakes with that other great system of water communication, the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Mr. President, believing as I believe that this is not a local work common to the people of my own State and the State of Illinois, but that it is a work national and general in its character, diffusing its benefits throughout every portion of our country, I intend at every opportunity to give my vote to this measure, believing that it ought to be entered upon at once if we are to expend money at all for the improvement of the water ways of this country.

I have said much more than I intended to say upon this question when I rose. I only wanted to get information.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. He alluded some moments ago in his speech to the fact that European nations—England, Germany, and France—were making new canals. I desire to ask him whether the canals which are now being constructed in Europe are constructed on the plan of being run by horses or mules on tow-paths, or whether they are so large that the boats are to be navigated by steam?

Mr. ALLISON. In every way. I have seen them operated by steam and I have seen them operated with mules on tow-paths.

Mr. GEORGE. But I speak of the new ones that are being constructed. That is the point to which I desire to call the Senator's attention. Are they making the old-fashioned tow-path canals or not?

Mr. ALLISON. They are enlarging them. Every canal is being enlarged now. Take the Delaware and Hudson canal. That is a short canal, coming into the Hudson River at Rondout. When that canal was first built it was built purely for the purpose of transporting coal, and the canal-boats only transported 40 tons. It has been enlarged certainly twice, until now, I believe, those canal-boats transport 300 tons, and they do it by steam.

I have not looked at the figures, but there is no difficulty in these canals. Of course wherever there is water and opportunity and money the canals will be built so as to be operated by steam; and I could hope that this canal would be so built. It certainly will be so built some time. Does the Senator from Mississippi doubt that the great Northwestern lakes and the Illinois River and Mississippi River will be connected by a national canal in the near future? We may not see our way clear to do it, but we shall see it very soon, especially when we appropriate money year by year for little, short rivers, and little improvements local to a State.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that I understand the Senator. I desire to ask him whether in Europe or anywhere else canals are now being constructed, or have been constructed in the last dozen years, which are to be operated by horse power instead of by steam?

Mr. ALLISON. I can not answer that question. I doubt whether any——

Mr. CHACE. May I answer it?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CHACE. I can say to the Senator from Mississippi that at this moment the Government of Russia is constructing a canal to connect the Caspian and Black Seas for the purpose of transporting the grain produced in Southeastern Russia, and that their plan is to make it deep enough and wide enough to take in barges, which will go through the Mediterranean, to be delivered along in the Mediterranean ports, and at the same time to provide different boats for hauling by animal power.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for answering the question.

Mr. CHACE. That is a very pregnant fact in connection with this discussion, for that very grain is to come in competition with the grain which will be transported from the granaries of the West through the great water system of the Mississippi River and its tributaries and the lakes to tide water on the Atlantic.

Mr. ALLISON. Upon the subject as to what nations do for their own people, I wish to say that Great Britain has within the last twenty years guaranteed nearly $100,000,000 for the extension and expansion of government works in India, in order to enable India to compete with the constituents of the Senator from Mississippi in the raising of cotton and in order to enable them to compete with my constituents in the raising of wheat. More than £20,000,000, or $100,000,000, have been put into what are known as productive water-works in India for the double purpose of navigation and irrigation. In many cases the chief object is navigation, using lateral canals of a smaller character and the streams for purposes of irrigation. So Great Britain has guaranteed millions upon millions of pounds for the extension and expansion of her railway system, connecting the different portions of the wheat and cotton growing regions of India, in order that she might compete with the prairies of Iowa and the cotton region of Mississippi and the other Southern States.

Shall we lie by with our hands tied and gyves upon our wrists and proclaim that here are two or three million dollars to be expended out of the hundred million of surplus in the Treasury for the beginning of an improvement which is to connect the great water systems of our country North and South, and that we will not do it simply because it costs a few million dollars? No, Mr. President; if we are able to do it I believe that it is wise to do it.

Therefore I shall vote for this amendment, believing it to be one of the wisest and best provisions in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Iowa has said several times incidentally that this canal would cost but two or three million dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. I speak of the Illinois and Michigan Canal enlargement.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is only a small piece of it. We speak of the whole enterprise. The Illinois and Michigan Canal part is about $2,300,000.

Mr. ALLISON. But I was endeavoring to show that whatever became of the Hennepin Canal, we ought to accept the action of the Legislature of the State of Illinois and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan Canal so as to make a connection by means of the Illinois River and that canal with the great system of Northwestern lakes, and thus realize the dream of La Salle, who traversed it two hundred years ago.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator, then, would have us at least to take the canal from Chicago down to Hennepin and enlarge it at a cost of, say, two million and a quarter dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. I would.

Mr. HAWLEY. You would enlarge it to a draught of 7 feet. What is the condition of the Illinois River below Hennepin down to the Mississippi? What is the draught?

Mr. ALLISON. It certainly has a draught of 7 feet, I presume. Toward the mouth it is much more.

Mr. CULLOM. I can answer the Senator. There is the creation of a system of locks on the Illinois River. The State of Illinois mainly has built two locks already. It is proposed that the Government of the United States shall build two more near the mouth of the Illinois River. When the four locks are completed there will be a depth of 7 feet in the Illinois River, and that is all we can get without largely overflowing the country around it.

So in order to get such a system as is necessary to connect the Mississippi River and the lakes, it is the judgment of most men who have given the subject any consideration that while the locks on the Illinois River should be completed so as to give that much of a depth of water for commerce, it is also necessary that the Hennepin Canal shall be constructed so as to connect with the Mississippi River higher up, and give a greater depth of water on that canal.

Mr. HAWLEY. So the larger portion of the proposed expenditure is not for merely a connection between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, which you have now, but it is for a shorter connection.

Mr. CULLOM. We have already a system of connection between Chicago and the mouth of the Illinois River; but it is not the sort of a connection that is of sufficient value to the commerce of the country. The mouth of the Illinois is about 275 miles south of Rock Island, so that any benefit which the Northwest and the West would get for all the regions in the latitude of Rock Island, if you please, the western terminus of the Hennepin Canal, would be of no practical value to the people north of that, because to go down the Mississippi River and then up the Illinois River to Chicago would be a greater distance than would be profitable to carry the products of the country.

So whatever the Government may be able to do in the way of the improvement of the Illinois River, and thereby connecting it with the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, the commerce of the country demands also that the cut-off between Hennepin and Rock Island or the Mississippi River in that region shall be made so as to benefit the people west and northwest of the Mississippi River at that point.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not expect to invite the Senator to a general argument. I should like to know what the present condition of the Illinois River is in the absence of these two or three locks. What draught can be taken up there?

Mr. CULLOM. There can be very little commerce done on the Illinois River in its present condition. The two locks which have been built are a short distance below the city of Peoria. In other words, the north end of the river has been improved, while the south portion of the river, near the mouth of it, has not yet been improved. The Government is now expending a small sum of money on the two lower locks, but it is only proposed in this bill to appropriate $100,000 for those improvements, so that it will be some time before that river can even be improved sufficiently to give a depth of water of 7 feet. But even when those locks are completed that is all the benefit that can be given.

Mr. CHACE. I think the Government has already appropriated something over half a million dollars.

Mr. CULLOM. The State of Illinois has expended a great deal more on its own account.

Mr. LOGAN. Illinois itself expended about $400,000.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I hope not to detain the Senate very long with any remarks of my own on this question, as I have discussed it once before; but as the general subject of canals has been brought into the debate and their utility has been questioned, I feel called upon to say something in regard to the value of canals at the present time, not only in the amount of the freight they carry, but in the control which they exercise over all the great trunk lines of railroad in our country.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] told the Senate the other day that canals were obsolete, and they advised Congress that if it should attempt to do anything in this matter it should build a railroad instead of a canal on this proposed route. The Senator from Connecticut brought in here figures to show that the cost of transportation upon the Erie Canal was forty-nine one-hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, and that the lines of railroad competing with the canal and in some places upon its banks had been carrying freight for fifty-five one-hundredths of a cent per ton per mile. I think I am correct in my quotation.

Mr. PLATT. I said less than 4 mills per ton per mile, and I thought as low as 3 mills per ton per mile.

Mr. MILLER. By the railroads?

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir; from Chicago to New York.

Mr. MILLER. I do not know anything about those figures.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from New York will yield to me I will read a paragraph which may be of importance to him.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I read from the report of the Interstate Commerce Committee, page 172:

It appears from the report of the State engineer of New York (January 20, 1885) that during 1884 the average rate of freight on the New York Central, the Erie, and the West Shore Railroads was .740 of a cent per ton per mile, against .845 of a cent per ton in 1883, while the average rate of canal freight was .270 of a cent per ton per mile, against .340 of a cent per ton in 1883. The figures given show that the business of the canals shared in the depression common to all industrial movements and enterprises during 1884.

Mr. MILLER. I am very much obliged to the Senator for reading that. I had it before me, and intended to call the attention of the Senate to those figures.

Mr. PLATT. I made my statement on the testimony of Mr. Fink upon the rate for grain from Chicago to New York. These statements are the average cost of freight, or the rate including all freights. I took the rates which had been made upon grain, and I took Mr. Fink's statement of 10 cents per hundred from Chicago to New York. As I figure it out it is less than 3 mills per ton per mile.

Mr. MILLER. I shall not go into those figures. I have enough here to show the importance of canals.

In the first place, I hold in my hand a telegram signed William J. Pope, Chicago Board of Trade, which says:

The present rate of freight from Chicago to New York by lake and canal is 6 cents per bushel, while the lowest rail rate at the present time is 15 cents per bushel.

This shows that the rate by rail is 50 per cent. greater than by lake and canal.

I also have here a statement prepared by Mr. Fink, showing the rate by all rail and by lake and canal, running back to 1868 and coming down to 1884. It shows that in 1868 the rate by lake and canal was 24.54 cents per bushel. This was before the great improvement had been made in the Detroit River allowing large vessels to pass through it, and before the tolls had been materially reduced upon the Erie Canal. In that same year the rate by rail was 42.06 cents per bushel. So coming along down to 1884, gradually reducing, the rate by lake and canal in 1884 was 6.60 cents per bushel; and in that year of great competition, of great depression, the lowest rate reached by rail was 13 cents per bushel, which, according to Mr. Fink, amounts to 20 cents per 100 pounds from Chicago to New York, which is equal to over 12 cents per bushel of wheat, and "is less than the average cost upon any of the railroads engaged in this traffic, even on the cheapest operated road."

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from New York permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from New York stated that that was the minimum rate. If he will look at the table he will see that it is the average rate.

Mr. MILLER. I stand corrected. It is the average rate.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Can the Senator state the relative quantities of grain carried during the winter months by water routes and by rail?

Mr. MILLER. During the winter months?

Mr. VEST. During the year, say from Chicago to New York, how much was carried by rail and how much by water?

Mr. MILLER. I shall come to that in a few minutes. I may not be able to give the figures for the entire year, but I shall be able to give the amount carried by canal and by railroad. The statement which was read a moment ago by the Senator from Illinois shows that in 1884 the average cost upon the Erie Canal for moving a ton of freight a mile was twenty-seven hundredths of a cent.

INFLUENCE OF THE ERIE CANAL.

Since that it has been reduced at times. I am not able to give the exact figures, but it has been done at a little less than twenty-five hundredths of a cent per mile, or in round numbers, a quarter of a cent per ton per mile. There is no railroad yet constructed which has ever approached such a low cost of transportation. The figures given here for the New York Central, the Erie, and the West Shore Railroads for average charges are the charges which they made when there was a hot competition between the West Shore and the New York Central; and it will be remembered that that contest continued until the West Shore, no longer able to meet its ordinary operating expenses, to say nothing of its fixed charges, surrendered, and was leased by the New York Central Railroad for four hundred and ninety-nine years.

No railroad has ever been constructed and operated of any size of which I have any knowledge which has yet been able to carry its freight at an average of half a cent per ton per mile. Wherever it has been done, as in the low competing rates between Chicago and New York, rates compelled by the competition of the lakes and the canal, freight has been carried at an enormous loss, and those railroads have recouped themselves upon the local traffic of the roads, as the Senator from Connecticut well knows, for he was a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce which made the investigation a year ago.

Mr. President, I have just read you a dispatch showing that the present rate of freight from Chicago to New York by all water is 6 cents a bushel, and the present rate of freight from Chicago to New York by all rail is 15 cents a bushel. The railroads are utterly unable to meet the competition of the lakes and the canal; and they can not and do not now attempt to go below the figure I have named. Of course the business which is done by the railroads in the transportation of grain to-day is limited to the local demand along the roads, or to the demand of New England, which receives its grain largely over the New York Central, taking it east from Albany, or to those shipments of grain which are made in which the necessity of ready movement comes in as one of the chief elements in the business transaction.

I have stated that the Erie Canal is able to transport through its entire length successfully, and has done it, freight at the extreme low rate of one quarter of a cent per ton per mile, and what the Erie Canal is doing for the great commerce of the lakes, in my judgment, the Hennepin Canal, if constructed, will do for the great commerce of the Mississippi Valley and for the great Northwest, which in a few years must be our chief reliance for our supply of wheat.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR AND THE UTICA CONVENTION.

A year ago next month a convention was called at Utica, in the State of New York, to consider the question of further improving the Erie Canal by doubling the length of its locks so that two boats could pass at once, and also by bottoming out the canal 1 foot and by raising the banks 1 foot, thereby giving 2 feet more of water. Governor Seymour attended that convention, and I believe it was the last public act, if I may say so, of his life. All who knew him know that he had given great attention to the subject of the Erie Canal and to the improvement of the lakes, and in fact to all of our great internal improvements. His remarks upon that occasion, when he was called upon to preside, I find only partially reported in the New York Tribune. They were fully printed at the time in pamphlet form, but I regret that I am not now able to put my hand upon the pamphlet. I will read a few extracts from his remarks upon this question. He spoke of the great benefit which had come to the trade of the country; first, by the reduction of the tolls upon the Erie Canal. It will be remembered by all who have given the subject consideration that originally the tolls upon the Erie Canal were very high, and that they were gradually reduced, year by year, or decade by decade, until a few years ago they were entirely removed. Speaking of the period when they were high, he said:

The balance of trade against our country, before the reduction of the tolls, was—

For a period of years—the number of years is not given here—I think the period was about ten years—

It was $800,000,000. After the canals had reduced their tolls in the next eight years the balance of trade in favor of our country was $1,300,000,000.

Undoubtedly Governor Seymour was correct in arguing that that change of the balance of trade from $800,000,000 against us to $1,300,000,000 in our favor was brought about by the Erie Canal and by the cheapening of the rate of the transportation of grain from Chicago to New York city. It was doubtless not all due to the reduction of tolls upon the Erie Canal, but some of it was due to the causes of which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] spoke the other day, when he told the Senate that the improvement of the Detroit River by which the largest ships were enabled to navigate the lakes had saved to the country in the transportation of the products directly affected by it at least $100,000,000 per annum. Undoubtedly some of this saving over this line of transportation must be attributed to that cause as well as to the Erie Canal. But I fully agree with Governor Seymour in the statement that if those improvements had not been made, and if the tolls upon the Erie Canal had not been lowered, the balance of trade would not have changed in our favor; for we should not have been able to compete in the markets of Europe with the native-grown grain and with the importations from Russia. Speaking of the proposed improvement which was submitted to this canal convention a year ago, he said:

I believe there is a brighter outlook for the canals in the immediate future, that will enable them to carry larger cargoes and do business on more advantageous terms. To-day you are here to declare with one voice that our canals must and shall be sustained. Men who seek to impair their usefulness or to destroy them must encounter determined and earnest men who will sustain the canals and thus do their duty to their country. Never in the history of the country was any act so beneficial as that which struck off the tax on commerce. Some nations in Europe taxed it and won our dislike; but what was that to our imposing a tariff on our own products.

So he went on to argue, as did the whole convention, for a further enlargement of the Erie Canal both as to the depth of water and as to the length of locks. An estimate was made at the convention by men familiar with the canals as to the result of the improvements, if they should be made, which were then recommended; that is, the doubling of the locks so that two boats may pass together; for upon the Erie Canal we have a system of one canal-boat propelled by steam carrying with it a consort, thus dispensing entirely with the old-fashioned system of towing by horses. This system has become very popular and is very largely employed. But these two boats have to be coupled closely and solidly together, and when they come to the locks of course they have to be separated, for the present locks are simply long enough to take in one boat.

APPROPRIATIONS BY NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

The Legislature two years ago appropriated, I think, $30,000 to make the experiment of lengthening one of these locks by a new system which had been invented. The experiment was made, and last year it was used during the whole season of canal navigation. It was found to work with perfect success, and the late Legislature of the State of New York has appropriated $200,000 to go on and lengthen a large number of locks. It is estimated that it will cost something more than a million dollars to lengthen them all, but undoubtedly the State of New York will do it.

The other proposition is to deepen the canal by digging it a foot deeper and to raise the bank by putting dirt upon it a foot higher. It is not expected that this will increase the depth of water 2 feet throughout the entire length of the canal, because where the canal passes over culverts or aqueducts, over streams, it can not be done; and the tonnage of the boats will not be very much greater than now by this system; but it will give more water under the boat, and, as every man familiar with the running of water craft knows, boats will run much more easily and with much less power if there is a sufficient depth of water under the boat than they will if the boat runs very close to the bottom of the canal.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE ERIE CANAL.

The estimates made I say at that time by canal men who were competent to judge were to the effect that if this improvement was made by doubling the length of the locks and deepening the water as proposed, the cost of transportation over the Erie Canal would be reduced somewhere from 25 to 50 per cent. The majority of the people present, I think all the boatmen, held to the opinion that it would reduce the cost nearly if not quite 50 per cent. The charge was then one-quarter of a cent per ton per mile. When this improvement shall have been completed the actual cost of transporting freight over the Erie Canal will be somewhere from twelve one-hundredths to fifteen one-hundredths of a cent per ton per mile.

Is there any Senator here, is there any man anywhere, who believes that it will ever be possible for any railroad to approach anywhere near those figures? I do not believe the time will ever come when any railroad will be able to carry freight profitably, making a fair dividend upon its actual cost, for less than half a cent per ton per mile. The Erie Canal, when improved and enlarged as it is proposed to do, will in my judgment carry freight for one-quarter of that figure. When you take that low cost, and apply it to the transportation of all the products of the great West and of the Mississippi Valley, you will have a sum which year by year will amount to more than all that has ever yet been appropriated for the improvements of rivers and harbors in this country since the first river and harbor act was passed.

Talk about canals being antiquated! Talk about building a railroad to take the place of that kind of transportation! It is chimerical; it is absurd. If we were to build a railroad in place of the Hennepin Canal, what would it do? Does the Senator suppose that it would reach or control the commerce of the great Northwest? Not at all. How shall it be done? When the Hennepin Canal is constructed it makes a free water way from the great lakes to the Mississippi. That means a great deal. The Mississippi Valley is a great empire in itself. Soon the center of the population of this country will be near the shores of the Mississippi River.

We have now a free water way running from the Atlantic up the Hudson through the Erie Canal and through the great lakes 1,500 miles in extent. Shall we stop there when the construction of a new work of 65 miles will bring the great Father of Waters into close contact with the great lakes? Mr. President, there is not a possible interest in this country which would not be benefited by that great work.

In justification of the statement I have made that the improvement of the Erie Canal as now proposed would reduce the cost of transportation through to from twelve one-hundredths to fifteen one-hundredths of a cent per ton per mile let me read from a report which was made by the State engineer of the State of New York, assisted by Charles B. Stuart, who was appointed by the President of the United States to make a survey of the Erie Canal in connection with an offer which was made by the State of New York some years ago asking the Federal Government to make the improvement. Without going into their lengthy report I simply quote this language:

By the enlargement of the Erie Canal, as authorized by the Legislature of the State of New York in 1837, so as to be navigable for boats of 240 tons, instead of 80 tons as then in use, it was proven that the cost of transportation by means of this enlarged canal was reduced 50 per cent.

And they find further that—

By the deepening of this enlarged trunk of the Erie Canal as now existing, and by the lengthening of the locks, a saving of nearly the same amount may be obtained.

In the judgment of the engineer of the State of New York, assisted by Engineer Charles B. Stuart, appointed by the President, if this improvement was made the cost would be reduced again about 50 per cent.

TRAFFIC ON ERIE CANAL.

The Erie Canal has shown no considerable diminution of its traffic. It remains substantially as it has been for the past ten years. The Erie Canal is transporting now year by year, and has been for the past ten years, between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 tons of freight during the six or seven months of the year in which it is navigated. But let us see what it does during those six months. From the 1st day of January, 1883, to the 31st of December, 1883, there arrived in New York 124,336,237 bushels of grain, of which the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad brought 32,125,615 bushels; the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad, 28,765,288 bushels; the Pennsylvania Railroad, 13,060,494 bushels; the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, 4,581,770 bushels; various other routes, 856,924 bushels; by river and coast of Western-grown grain, 3,725,238 bushels; by the canal, 41,220,908 bushels.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Was that of grain alone?

Mr. MILLER. Of grain alone. Forty-one million two hundred and twenty thousand nine hundred and eight bushels of grain were brought by the canal to New York in the year 1883. Taking the whole amount and reducing it to percentages, we find that the New York Central Railroad carried, running for twelve months in the year, 25.84 per cent. of the grain coming to New York city; the Erie Railway 23.13; the Pennsylvania 10.50; the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western 3.69 per cent.; and the Erie Canal in seven months carried 33.15 per cent. more than any of the great trunk lines of railroad which run the year throughout.

Then if you go into other descriptions of freight, such as lumber, coal, and iron ore, you find that about the same proportions hold. We see in these figures what is the great controlling power of the Erie Canal over all the railroad freights of the country.

HENNEPIN CANAL IS TO BE THE ERIE CANAL OF THE NORTHWEST.

Why will not the Hennepin Canal do the same thing for the Mississippi Valley and the great Northwest? Canals are not obsolete. Railroads have not and can not take their places. Why shall it be said that the Hennepin Canal if builded will be of no benefit to the Mississippi Valley and of no benefit to the great lakes and to the Atlantic seaboard? The Hennepin Canal as now projected is to float boats of 40 tons burden greater than the Erie Canal. The limit upon the Erie Canal is 240 tons. I think the average does not exceed 200 tons of freight.

Why shall it be said, then, that the Hennepin Canal is too small, that it is worthless to build a canal there unless you build a ship-canal? The Senator from Connecticut told the Senate that it would be entirely useless; that all the freight collected upon the Mississippi River would of necessity break bulk at the entrance of the canal into the Mississippi River and again break bulk at Chicago.

But this will not be necessary so far as breaking bulk at the entrance of the canal into the Mississippi River is concerned. Upon the Mississippi River running up into the Northwest territory undoubtedly there will be constructed a class of canal barges carrying 280 tons which will go up and down the Mississippi River, towed by great and powerful steamboats, as we now tow the Erie Canal boats up and down the Hudson River. If you will travel upon that river you will see at any time great tows of canal-boats, fifty and one hundred sometimes in a single tow, all loaded, being carried up from New York to the canal by a powerful steamer.

The same thing will take place upon the Mississippi River. Boats will be constructed to carry grain of 280 tons burden, and they will collect the grain and the produce of the great Northwest upon the Mississippi and all its branches, and it will come down and up that river in these tows and be delivered to the canal and carried by the canal to Chicago, where undoubtedly bulk will be broken, the grain being transferred to the elevators and from the elevators to the great ships of the lakes carrying 2,500 tons burden.

I have no doubt whatever that the Hennepin Canal, if constructed, will do for the great Northwest precisely what the Erie Canal has done and is doing to-day for all the produce of the West; that is, it is carrying it to-day, or enabling it to be carried, from Chicago to New York, as I have shown by the dispatch just read here, for one-third what it is carried by railroad.

But the price mentioned here of 15 cents a bushel from Chicago to New York you must bear in mind is made to-day when the lakes and canal are open. When the lakes and canal are frozen then that rate is doubled at once. If there was no Erie Canal to-day, and if the improvements had not been made upon the Detroit River, I do not hesitate to say, and I defy successful contradiction, that we could not sell a barrel of flour or a bushel of grain of any kind in any of the markets of the world outside of our own shores. The price of wheat and flour in Liverpool to-day shows that conclusively; and if the produce of the Great West had not this canal it could not avail itself of any foreign market whatever.

Still, forsooth, the Senator from Kansas tells us that the cheapening of the rates of transportation is no benefit to the producer of the grain. I shall not stop to answer any such argument or statement as that. But let me come down to some estimates as to what the Hennepin Canal will do for the produce of the Mississippi Valley and the great Northwest. It is estimated in Executive Document No. 38 of the last Congress, transmitted by the President of the United States, that—

The actual charge per bushel from Saint Paul to Chicago, via the Mississippi River and the Hennepin Canal, would then be as follows:

	Cents.
Saint Paul to western terminus of Hennepin Canal	3
Mississippi River to Chicago, via Hennepin and Illinois and Michigan Canals	2.9 or 3
Total from Saint Paul to Chicago	6

Supposing it to be completed upon the present plans.

Thus there would be effected a saving of 6 cents per bushel on wheat from the Upper Mississippi River districts to Chicago, and so on the vast aggregate of that cereal now compelled to seek entrance upon the water-route of the lakes only through transportation by railroad.

Now, let us see what are some of the charges in the West for transportation of grain to Chicago, where it receives the benefit of lake competition. Let us see where the argument of the Senator from Connecticut stands in regard to the cost of transportation by railroads as compared with canals. I read:

Actual results are shown already, it may be further urged, as due to the direct competition of canal and railroad, in the case of Illinois and Michigan Canal and the railroads by which it is paralleled. The railroad commissioners of Illinois established the freight charge on wheat by rail last season—

There the commissioners, I believe, have the power of fixing rates if they see fit to do so.

Mr. CULLOM. The rates they fix are prima facie evidence of being reasonable, and can only be overturned by the decisions of the court.

Mr. MILLER. Further—

The railroad commissioners of Illinois established the freight charge on wheat by rail last season at 11 cents per 100 pounds, or 6.6 cents per bushel, for 100 miles, the distance from La Salle to Chicago; for 130 miles, the distance from Henry, on the Illinois River, to Chicago, 12 cents per 100 pounds, or 7.2 cents per bushel; for 182 miles, the distance from Rock Island to Chicago, 13.4 cents per 100 pounds, or 8.2 cents per bushel.

That is, the rate from the point where the Hennepin Canal is to enter the Mississippi River, as fixed by these commissioners, is 13.4 cents per 100 pounds, or 8.2 cents per bushel. There the Senator from Connecticut has a railroad commission with absolute power to fix railroad rates, desiring of course to benefit the people so far as it can and be just to the railroad, and it fixes a rate at 8.2 cents per bushel for transporting wheat from Rock Island to Chicago, a distance by rail of 182 miles. To-day the rate from Chicago to New York by water, which is at least 1,200 miles the way the boat runs, is 6 cents per bushel. It costs 25 per cent. less to carry wheat from Chicago to New York by lake and canal than it costs to transport it from Rock Island, 180 miles away from Chicago, just across the State, to Chicago.

It is presumed that the railroad commissioners have done their duty and that they know something about the duties of the office which they discharge. If they have permitted this great charge to be made, which is exorbitant and far beyond the cost of the transportation, if the Senator from Connecticut is anywhere near right in his estimate, then I submit that the people of Illinois ought to be up and stirring. They ought to see to it why the men put in charge of their railroads and having a despotic power to fix the rates of freight have given this rate of 8.2 cents per bushel from Rock Island to Chicago.

IMPORTANCE OF CANALS.

Mr. President, there was never a time in the history of transportation from the day the Erie Canal was first conceived down to the present moment when the principal canals of the country were doing so much good to all the people as they are doing to-day. This fact can not be gainsaid, it can not be turned aside. The estimate in this report is that if the Hennepin Canal is builded every bushel of grain grown west of the Mississippi River, and therefore tributary to this canal and controlled by it, will be reduced in its cost of transportation from that country to Chicago, where it meets the lakes, 6 cents a bushel. That saving will pay all the river and harbor bills which will pass any Congress for the next ten years in its saving made in one year.

I regret with the Senator from Connecticut that this measure could not have come in by itself and have received the consideration it deserved and have received a beginning appropriation of at least $2,000,000. This work ought to be constructed in three years. It can be shown, and I think I have shown it, that the construction of it will save every year from the moment it is ready to receive freights more than its entire cost, vastly more than that, to the grain producers and the grain consumers of this country.

Mr. HEARST. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. HEARST. Has the Senator an estimate of the difference in the actual cost of railroad traffic and canal transportation?

Mr. MILLER. The Senator perhaps was not in when some time ago I gave that estimate. I will repeat it so that the Senator may understand it. The engineer of the State of New York reported January 20, 1885, that the average rate of freight upon the New York Central, the Erie, and the West Shore Railroads had been for the year previous, when they were in competition, seven hundred and forty thousandths of a cent per ton per mile. For the same year the charges on the Erie Canal had been twenty-seven hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, which the Senator will see is only a little more than one-third of what it was upon the railroads. Since then the charges by rail have been somewhat reduced and the charges by canal still further reduced.

Mr. HEARST. I knew the Senator from New York had great experience in that sort of thing, and hence I wanted to ask him the question.

Mr. MILLER. I am much obliged to the Senator for calling out the figures again.

Mr. President, the question has been raised here inferentially as to the propriety of these river and harbor bills, and as to the constitutionality of Congress buying small canals like the Sturgeon Bay Canal, of which we heard the other day, and the Keweenaw Point Canal also; and now the question is raised again regarding this canal, and we find a rumor floating about the Senate Chamber—you will meet it in the corridors and in the cloak-rooms—that this bill is to be vetoed; that so many of these things have been put into it and are being put into it that the President is sure to veto it. Sir, I do not care to speculate upon the probabilities of an Executive veto of this bill. We have had them before, and we know the results. There was a veto of a river and harbor bill many years ago by President Polk, and Mr. Webster at a public dinner given to him in Philadelphia in 1846 had something to say about that veto and about the power of Congress to pass these measures and to build these canals; and although it may weary the Senate, I will venture at this time to read a few extracts from that remarkable speech.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator inform us how much was the amount appropriated in the bill vetoed by Mr. Polk?

Mr. MILLER. I think the amount was only some two or three million dollars. It was a very small amount, and it was a very small veto, and met with a very small amount of support in the country; but I submit that it has nothing to do with the question whether the amount was 25 cents or $25,000,000. The amount then was much more in proportion to the population of the country and to the vast commercial interests of this country than the amount contained in this bill to-day, in my judgment.

DANIEL WEBSTER AN EARNEST ADVOCATE OF RIVER AND HARBOR BILLS.

But let us see what Mr. Webster had to say upon the general subject of the improvement of our rivers and harbors. After speaking of the veto and of his great surprise at it, Mr. Webster said:

Well, now, what is to be done? We can not shut our eyes to what is around us. Here we are. This vast country, with the ocean on the east, and the Gulf on the south, and the great lakes on the north and the west, and these great rivers penetrating it through hundreds and thousands of miles—what are we to do? Is it not, of all countries in the world, that for which nature has done mighty things, and yet calls most loudly for man to do his part? Providence has given us a country capable of improvement. It is not perfected; we are called to do something for ourselves; to wake up, in this day of improvement, and do the deeds that belong to improvement; to facilitate internal intercourse; to furnish harbors for the protection of life and property; to remove obstructions from the rivers; to do everything, all and singular, which a large and liberal policy will suggest to an intelligent people, with abundance of means, for the advancement of the national prosperity.

We live in an age, gentlemen, when we are not to shut our eyes to the great examples set us all over the European continent. I do not speak of England, where private enterprise and wealth have gone so far ahead. But look to Russia, to Prussia, to Austria, to Saxony, to Sardinia; everywhere we see a spirit of improvement, active, stimulated, and persevering. We behold mountains penetrated by railroads, safe harbors constructed, everything done by government for the people which in the nature of the case the people can not do for themselves.

Let us contemplate for a moment the Mississippi. This noble and extraordinary stream, with seven or eight millions of people on its banks and on the waters falling into it, absolutely calls for the clearing out rivers and for the removal of snags and other obstacles to safe navigation. Who is to do this? Will any one of the States do it? Can all of the States do it? Is it the appropriate duty of any one State or any number of States? We know it is not. We know that unless this Government be placed in the hands of men who feel that it is their constitutional duty to make these improvements they never will be made and the waters of the Mississippi will roll over snags, and snags, and snags, for a century to come. These improvements must come from the Government of the United States, or in the nature of things they can not come at all; and I say that every steamboat that is lost by one of these snags, every life that is sacrificed, goes to make up a great account against this Government. Why, what a world is there! What rivers and what cities on their banks—Cincinnati, Louisville, Saint Louis, Natchez, New Orleans, and others that spring up while we are talking of them, or, indeed, before we begin to speak of them; commercial marts, great places for the exchange of commodities along these rivers, which are, as it were, so many inland seas! And what! the General Government no authority over them—no power of improvement!

And so, Mr. President, he goes on arguing the question as to the constitutionality of making these improvements and the objection of the then President of the United States in regard to these improvements being local and being contained within the limits of a single State. He says:

The President says that some of the objects provided for by the bill are local and lie within the limits of a single State. Well, I dare say they do. It would be somewhat remarkable if a harbor were found lying in two or three States.

It would be rather a large harbor that would embrace parts even of Connecticut and Rhode Island, two of the smallest of the States.

And so he goes on with a full argument in regard to the constitutionality of the then bill and of the items contained in it; and in concluding upon this question he lays down this general doctrine:

Having thus alluded to the report of the committee of the Senate and not having time to discuss its propositions at any considerable length, I will now, by way of conclusion, give to you my views on all this question of the power of making harbors. It is my opinion—

That Congress has the power to make harbors on the rivers and on the lakes to the full extent to which it has ever proposed to exercise such power.

That whether these proposed harbors be judged useful for foreign commerce or only for commerce among the States themselves, the principle is the same, and the constitutional power is given in the same clause and in the same words.

That Congress has power to clear out obstructions from all rivers suited to the purposes of commerce, foreign or domestic, and to improve their navigation and utility by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States.

That whether a river divide two States or more than two, or run through two States or more than two, or is wholly confined to one State, is immaterial, provided its importance to commerce, foreign or domestic, be admitted.

I think it wholly immaterial whether a proposed improvement in a river, for commercial purposes, be above or below an actually existing port of entry.

If, instead of clearing out the rocks, and in that manner improving the channel of a river, it is found better to make a canal around falls which are in it, I have no doubt whatever of the power of Congress to construct such a canal. I think, for instance, that Congress has the power to purchase the Louisville Canal around the Falls of the Ohio, and that it ought to exercise that power now, if the work can be purchased for a reasonable price; and that the canal should then be free to all who have occasion to use it, reserving such tolls only as are sufficient to keep the works in repair.

Thus, sir, that distinguished Senator argued this great question.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me for making a statement in that connection, I will say that I had occasion once to examine Mr. Webster's speeches made in different parts of the country and in Congress on this subject, and I am satisfied that he made more speeches in number in advocacy of the views that the Senator has cited than upon any other one question, and that it was the proposition of political expediency and constitutional law which he felt most interest in of all those which he discussed during his public life, with the single exception of the doctrine of the supremacy of the National Government within its sphere.

Mr. MILLER. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for this interruption, and if I had time I should have gone to the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, which was made, I think, two years ago, in which he very fully covered this whole subject. I desired also this morning to quote from some speeches made by Mr. Webster at New York and Buffalo at public dinners, but on sending to the Congressional Library I was unable to get the volumes containing them, every volume of his works being out of the library except the one from which I have read. But I think I am not mistaken—if I am mistaken I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will correct me—if my memory serves me right, in one of those speeches made at some public reception Mr. Webster took the ground decidedly that the Federal Government had an undoubted power to build a canal anywhere, through a single State or through a number of States, if the interests of interstate commerce demanded it.

THE GROWTH OF THE CITY OF BUFFALO.

Speaking of Buffalo and of the building of the great harbor of Buffalo from which has grown one of the chief cities of the State of New York, he said when the first appropriation was made for that work there was no harbor there at all; no vessel could land or could lie there; the mouth of the little creek was exposed to all the gales of the lake, and that he, Mr. Webster, voted for the first appropriation to build the first breakwater there and that he had continued to vote for all those appropriations, as I think he did during his whole public career; and out of that beginning at Buffalo, which is now the terminus of the Erie Canal, we have one of the greatest grain ports in the world and one of the most flourishing cities in this Union. Without the hand of the Government in the construction of its harbor there never would have been any city there at all.

Mr. President, referring to the first portion of Mr. Webster's speech from which I have read, which dwells upon the importance of developing the great resources of the country which has been given to us by Providence, I desire at this time to remind the Senate that from the beginning of our session in December down to the present time we have been receiving petitions by the thousands and tens of thousands, signed chiefly by the laboring men of this country, asking for liberal appropriations for internal improvements. Is it not wise to listen to that voice? To-day, when several hundred thousand laboring men are out of employment, when industry is almost at a standstill, when strikes reach from one end of our land to the other, would it not be wise to go forward when we have an overflowing Treasury, which to-day under the present administration holds a surplus of $50,000,000 more than it did a year ago, to make, as these petitions have asked us to make, liberal appropriations for internal improvements?

RIVER AND HARBOR BILLS A BENEFIT TO THE LABORING MAN.

How can we better use the money? We are not to increase our Army. We are not, evidently, to materially increase our Navy this year. Evidently from the appropriation bills we are not to make large expenditures for coast defenses. What shall we do with the people's money now hoarded in the United States Treasury? The money put into circulation by being paid for labor (for 99 per cent. of it would go into labor, and material which is only labor, whether it be lumber or stone or cement, for whatever it may be it is all the direct product of labor) would benefit the country and the laboring men especially. The distribution of fifteen or twenty million dollars would put in motion large bodies of men, and they would be engaged on works which would return to the country a thousand-fold of profit.

These works are confessedly necessary. The work at Galveston Harbor, the work at the mouth of the Saint John's River, the work at Charleston Harbor, at Baltimore, at Philadelphia, at New York, and the work upon the great interior rivers and lakes are all necessary. Everybody admits it; everybody expects them to be completed. Why not, then, complete them promptly by liberal appropriations and in the least possible time? The money expended at Galveston, at Charleston, and at the Saint John's River brings no return; it brings no interest back to make it a business transaction until the work is substantially done. When they shall be able to bring steamers into Galveston Harbor drawing 30 feet of water the cost of transporting cotton from Texas to Liverpool will be reduced very largely. Now none of those steamers can get in. Why should we be ten, fifteen, or twenty years doing this work? Why should we be half a dozen years deepening the water at the mouth of New York Harbor? Why should we spend a decade in deepening the water over the bar of the Saint John's River when we have the money to do it at once?

Mr. President, some Senators, I know, are opposed to going abroad to learn anything or to take any lessons in government; but if you will go to the old monarchies of Europe you will find that they manage such appropriations much more wisely than we do. Little France—I say "little" even in comparison with the State of Texas—is expending now $20,000,000 per year upon her harbors and rivers. She has been following it up at a greater or less expenditure for a thousand years, but her expenditure is now $20,000,000 per annum, and it is not made for one year. The last appropriation made was $100,000,000, to be expended at the rate of $20,000,000 per annum; and thus when the engineers lay out any great work there they know that the entire sum necessary for its construction has been provided for by law; the contract for the entire work is let at one time, and the work is pushed on to conclusion.

Mr. President, if we could do that in this country, if we could make appropriations here for such works as the deepening of the water at the entrance of New York Harbor, at Galveston Harbor, at Charleston Harbor, at the Saint John's River, and at these various other important ports upon the Atlantic seaboard, and if we could say to the engineers, "If this work at New York is to cost $10,000,000 we will appropriate it at once and you shall expend the whole of it at the rate of $3,000,000 per annum," then the work could go on steadily and in three or four years it would be completed. But now, with the richest people upon the earth, having the greatest facilities for commerce and having the largest number of navigable rivers of any country in the world, having the great interior lakes and having a country that is not yet one-thousandth part developed, with our Treasury overflowing with money, we higgle and piggle here about doing the necessary works for the development of this country, and we are told that if we swell this bill beyond a certain point the Executive veto awaits it and that there will be no money at all.

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss that part of the question. I am here to do my duty as I see it, and every other public official I have no doubt will do his as he sees it.

But the benefit to come from this river and harbor bill is not alone in the amount of money which will be put in circulation and paid out to the laboring men; that is the smallest part of it; but wherever this work is carried on in the making of new harbors, in the deepening of the water over the bars of these harbors, in the clearing out of all these rivers and streams, you will put in operation private enterprises which will be a thousand times greater upon any valuation than the money expended. Some gentlemen came here a few days ago from Ohio at a point where a large system of railroads is now centering. They said, "You have put into this bill only $5,000 for our harbor. Our railroad will be completed in a few months, and we shall be prepared to ship from that port this year many hundreds of thousands of tons of coal, and we expect to receive from the upper lakes, from Lake Superior, several hundred thousand tons of iron ore which are to be carried to the furnaces of the State of Ohio. With $5,000 we can do nothing; but the engineers state that with $25,000 they can in a few weeks' time so deepen the water or dredge out the bar at the mouth of that harbor that the lake steamers and the lake barges may come in and do that immense commerce. If it is not done, if this great country refuses to give an appropriation of $25,000, and says to us, we will give you $5,000 a year for five years, private enterprises amounting per annum to more than $50,000,000 will stand still instead of starting." So you may go wherever you will over this country and you will find that in nearly every case if this money shall be expended and the work shall be completed it will put into operation private enterprises of vast magnitude. Mr. President, they can not be measured; they run up into the thousands of millions of dollars.

We have been here now for seven months legislating for the people of this country. We have done nothing to lift the burden of the people; we have done nothing to give a new life to business; we have done nothing to give employment to labor. We are about to adjourn; we are going to pass the ordinary appropriation bills to pay the salaries of the Army officers and the Navy officers, the salaries of the clerks in the Departments and our own salaries; but what have we done as yet to improve the business of this country, to start afresh the wheels of commerce, to set the mills in motion which are now standing still, to bring plenty to the country—aye, to bring peace to the country, for if business once revives again then the labor troubles through which we have been wading for the past six months will have ended. When labor is employed at remunerative prices the country is safe, the country is quiet.

HONESTY OF THE MEASURE.

So, Mr. President, I wish the people of this country could come to fully understand this measure. To-day Congress ought to make an appropriation for rivers and harbors of not less than twenty-five to thirty million dollars. I expect that some one will shout "jobs" and "log rolling" and all the other pleasant terms which are poured out upon this body and the Committee on Commerce, but they have no effect whatever upon me. I assume, of course, that all the appropriations to be made are for worthy subjects, and in my judgment they nearly all are. There are some rivers in this bill which I should have been glad to see eliminated, but other Senators and Representatives coming from that section of the country, knowing the wants of that section of the country better than I do, knowing what the people need better than I do, assured the committee that they were important to the material prosperity of their own people and they demanded them, and I was bound as a representative here representing my State to accept the statements of honorable men as I expect them to accept mine upon questions of this kind. Undoubtedly the Representative or Senator from any particular State will have better information regarding the improvements in his own State than can any one else.

The fact that the appropriations for the States from which the members of this committee come have been increased in the Senate has been brought up here as an infamous charge against the committee. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] showed that the population of those States was more than half that of the whole country. He might have gone further and shown to this body that the commerce of those States thus represented was certainly not less than three-quarters of all the commerce of the country.

The appropriations in my own State were increased near $1,000,000, but it was nearly all for the great work of deepening the water at the entrance to New York Harbor, out of which passes three-quarters of all the exports and into which come nearly three-quarters of all the imports in our trade with foreign countries. I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment nearly every addition which has been made to this bill by the Senate has been wisely made. Are we to say here that a bill of this kind, which is intended to take care of the whole country, all of its harbors and rivers and all its internal water ways, having been made up by one branch of this legislative body, the other shall in no way increase it? I think not.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] told us that this bill had been made by a Democratic House, and he warns his colleagues on this side that it was impolitic for us as Republicans to increase it.

Mr. President, I know nothing of politics in a river and harbor bill. It is not made for the benefit of political parties. The money does not go into their coffers nor help to run their campaigns. These appropriations are made for the development of the great resources of this country, and if the House of Representatives has failed to do its full duty, or if the House, being Democratic and a majority of the committee coming from the Southern States, in looking to their own wants and their own necessities made a bill of a certain size, and did not put into it what I think should be put in for New York or for Michigan or for Illinois or for any other State, shall I be debarred by any political considerations from proposing to increase the amount? I think not. Certainly I never shall govern my conduct by any such rule as that.

It was perfectly natural, I think, that the members coming from the Southern States where there are a vast number of navigable rivers, and we of the North know nothing about the great navigable rivers of the South unless we go there and inspect them, should see the wants of that section. They have not many railroads running in from the sea coast and running in from the Gulf of Mexico. Their whole country is cut up by navigable streams. The people living along the line of those streams must have access to the sea and to the Gulf and to the ports. In my judgment, without going into the details of this bill, there is not 5 per cent. of waste in it. I say that after due and careful consideration of the bill, after having been in committee upon it, I think, for nearly two months, certainly more than a month and a half.

Mr. President, how are measures of this character to be formulated and passed? If the money expended is to be confined to a few great harbors or to two or three great rivers, how can it be done? What is a representative to do from any district lying upon the Chesapeake Bay or farther down to the south, which has a river or a bay in it where it is desired that a steamboat may come in order that it may bring to the people of that district the necessaries of life, in order that it may take away their little commerce—call it petty if you will, still it is all they have. And if it shall cost $5,000 or $2,500 to dredge out the bar at the mouth of the Cone River in order that the people living there, who are 75 miles away from the nearest railroad, shall have the mails thrice a week and shall have their sugar and tea and coffee and their clothing brought to them, and shall have carried out the little tobacco or the wheat or the crops which they may produce—shall it be said to that district that it shall not have an appropriation of $2,500 because it is not a great national improvement?

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say that the member from that district would be deservedly condemned by his people if he supported a bill in which a proper improvement for his own State could not be included. Why should he be asked to vote for the Mississippi River, why should he be asked to vote for New York Harbor and the great lakes and the Missouri River if his district having a navigable stream needing improvement shall have no consideration at the hands of Congress? Such a representative would be derelict in his duty if he supported the bill, in my judgment.

Our commerce has become so intricate, so far-reaching, that you can not to-day separate local traffic from interstate commerce. No man can tell where one begins and where the other ends. In the little case that I have supposed down on Chesapeake Bay the steamer which brings in the produce comes from Baltimore, outside of the State of Virginia. It is interstate commerce. So every pound of freight which floats down these Southern rivers or these Northern rivers to a port is finally distributed all over this country after having been manufactured up or sent abroad and goes into foreign commerce. Who can tell where to draw the line? It can only be drawn, in my judgment, at this point, that if the work is worthy of being done at all it should be done by the Federal Government. If no improvement can be made, if commerce can not be benefited, then let it go by.

As I have said before, I repeat, in my best judgment there is not 5 per cent. of waste in this bill. I do not believe there is 3 per cent. But of what use are the great harbors of this country, of what use are the great arteries, if there are to be no laterals? Of what use is the great port of New York and its thousand million dollars' worth of commerce per annum if it can not distribute that commerce in the little ports upon the great lakes, if it can not put it in little steamers and send it to the little ports in the South? When the aqueduct which is to bring water into this great city of Washington shall be completed and the great reservoir shall have been filled, if Congress should stop and then say, "This great aqueduct has been completed, this reservoir is built, and now the Government will not expend a single dollar in laying a main to carry that water to the houses of the people." So, Mr. President, your great harbors are of no value whatever unless you have got these little arteries and veins which run out and reach all the homes of this country and distribute the manufactures which we import and the manufactures which we make in this country. So also when the little farmer has grown his crop and wants to send it to market, it is of no value to him unless by some cheap means of transportation he can dispose of it.

Why, Mr. President, every Senator here knows that it will not pay to-day to transport the ordinary farm products 50 miles in a wagon. A farm located 50 miles away from a canal, a river, or a railroad, is absolutely worthless for ordinary farming purposes. It must be used for cattle growing or something of that kind. Farm products will not bear any such expensive transportation.

So, Mr. President, I do not hesitate myself to support the largest river and harbor bill which in the judgment of the board of engineers and of the committees of the two Houses shall be made up. Of course I assume that the items put in it are of importance to the trade and commerce of the country. This has been my position ever since I have been in public life, and I shall never change it. I believe to-day that this appropriation bill which we are now discussing is of more actual benefit to the whole people of this country than all the other money which we shall distribute by the various appropriation bills, outside of the Post-Office Department.

APPROVAL OF THESE MEASURES BY THE EAST.

Mr. President, I believe that the East generally approve of and support these measures not simply from selfish and local motives, as the Senator from Kansas suggested the other day, but because, having seen the benefits which come to all our people from river and harbor appropriations in the North and in the East, they are willing that they should be extended to the whole common country. We have no doubt, of course, that we shall be benefited along with the rest of the country, and that our trade and commerce will be benefited; but the Senator from Kansas sneeringly told us the other day that the West could take care of itself, that it wanted neither the help nor the sympathy of the East. Mr. President, I was sorry to hear those words. The East has sent out to the West its best blood in its best sons and daughters. The adventurous and enterprising men of the East have been looking to the West and they have filled it. Every Western State owns some Eastern State as its father and mother. Has the Senator forgotten the injunction of the Good Book, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee?"

I hope not, Mr. President, for if he has, the vengeance which follows the forgetting of that injunction will fall upon him.

I have traveled far and wide over the West, and never before from any man living in it have I heard such an expression as that. Wherever I have gone I have been welcomed as coming from the East, and I have been pointed to hundreds and thousands of the people of New York who have bettered their condition by locating in the various States of the West. Wherever I have gone I have never heard anything but the kindest expressions toward all the States of the East.

So, Mr. President, I am bound to believe that the Senator the other day allowed his bitter tongue to run away with his heart. I know he holds no sentiments of ill-will toward his mother, Massachusetts, or to any other portion of the East. He was simply boasting, I judge, of the great growth of the West, simply telling us older ones of the East that they have outgrown their tutelage and can now care for themselves.

But the Senator told us that he wanted no east and west lines of transportation made; that God had made the rivers to run north and south and that was enough; but statistics tell us that more trade crosses the one bridge at Saint Louis than goes down the Mississippi River. The lines of commerce in this country are east and west, no matter how the rivers run. Running up from the Atlantic coast through the canal and through the Great Lakes we have at least 1,500 miles of east and west navigation. Shall we stop there because there is 65 miles of intervening land which rises to the enormous altitude, as the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Kansas tell us, of 208 feet, and that therefore we should not attempt to defy the powers of Heaven and open a water way over such an immense mountain?

Mr. President, in my judgment there will be no rest or quiet upon this matter in this country until in some way and by some power the attempt is made to carry to successful conclusion the linking of the Mississippi River and the lakes together. The Government once attempted it in the Fox River improvement, but the route was too far north and it was too long, and it undoubtedly should never have been begun; but here Chicago upon the lakes approaches the Mississippi River at the nearest point. In a direct line I suppose it is little more than 100 miles. If the connection is to be made anywhere it must be made there; and there I think it ought to be made, and there I hope this Congress will decree it shall be made. In my judgment the inauguration of this work in fifty years from now will be looked back upon with as much interest and it will be considered of as much importance, as the beginning of a great commercial transaction, as was the inauguration of the work to construct the Erie Canal.

Mr. President, we are one people; our interests are one. We have done what we could to improve our own natural advantages. We have done what we could do by the West to improve their natural advantages. We have given from the Treasury liberally, and we are to-day paying interest upon bonds given to aid the construction of a great transcontinental railway. We are paying interest upon more than $60,000,000 of bonds, and we have given for the development of that portion of the West where there are few or no rivers untold millions of acres of land to enable private capital to build suitable railways, in order that the country might be opened and developed. I wish I knew how many million acres it was. I wish that some member of the Committee on Public Lands would give me the figures in order that they might be put into my speech, but I simply refer to the fact to show to the Senator from Kansas and to other Senators, and I believe the record will show it by going back fifty years, that the East has never withheld its hand when the dwellers in the Mississippi Valley asked that the jetties should be built and that that great river should be made navigable.

I know that many of the great men who have represented my State here have always stood for these improvements. Senator Seward during all his life was a believer in and an advocate of internal improvements. Early as a senator and governor of his own State before the Federal Government had taken up these works to any extent he was first and foremost in leading that State on in appropriating its money to widen and enlarge the Erie Canal and also to give its help to the construction of the Erie Railway through the southern tier of the State of New York, and everywhere and at all times, so far as I have been able to follow his history, he never failed to raise his voice either here or in public meetings in the State of New York or in the Great West when he traveled over it to speak in favor of great national improvements.

THE FIGHT ON THE ERIE CANAL.

Mr. President, the Erie Canal was fought at its beginning as desperately as the Hennepin Canal is being fought now, and finally the great genius, De Witt Clinton, who conceived it and substantially completed it, was turned out of his office as canal commissioner by a dirty political trick by the men who were opposed to it; and so it ever has been.

In fact, if I understood the Senator from Kansas the other day aright, his principal objection to the Hennepin Canal seemed to be that it was not already constructed and had not demonstrated its usefulness. He said he favored the Erie Canal, and would favor the taking of it by the Federal Government and the paying of all its expense and keeping it free, but the Hennepin Canal not being constructed the question as to its usefulness was an open one, of course, as all questions of this kind are open. Actual experiment can only finally be relied upon to demonstrate the theories which are advanced pro and con.

But I submit, in conclusion, Mr. President, that judging from the past, taking the present condition of the Erie Canal with the facts staring you in the face that to-day the rate of freight over that route from Chicago to New York all the way is 6 cents a bushel, that to-day the rate by rail is 15 cents per bushel, and if you desire to go a little further back and repeat the figures which were given by the Senator from Michigan to show how the reduction has gone on year by year for the past twenty years, it seems to me that you have an unanswerable argument, absolutely unanswerable, in favor of the construction of this canal, for as I have shown and as this report shows taken upon the plan upon which it is proposed to be constructed as matters stand to-day it will save to the producers and consumers of grain in this country 6 cents per bushel upon all the grain grown west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I am not going to reply to ne very able and forcible speech of the Senator from New York. I desire to compliment him upon it, although it fails to convince me that I should vote for this amendment. But I want to set myself right in a matter of figures.

I suggested the idea on Saturday that the way to compete with the railroads was to compete with them by a railroad rather than by a canal. I did not expect that that idea would be at once adopted by the Senate, but it is an idea which will grow in the history of this country. I gave some facts and figures showing that grain was actually carried by railroad at a price less than the cost of transportation of grain upon canals. I did not attempt to say that the average cost of transporting freight upon the railroads to-day was less than the average cost of transporting freight upon the canals.

My proposition was simply this, that the railroads in fact carried grain freight cheaper than the cost upon a canal. We have had all sorts of figures here to-day, but I take the figures which the Senator from New York gives us of the latest cost of transporting wheat per ton per mile on the Erie Canal, and as I understand, it is twenty-seven hundredths of a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. MILLER. That was two years ago.

Mr. PLATT. That is recent enough for all practical purposes. Now, it is an undisputed fact that the New York Central Railroad with its associated lines from Chicago has been bringing wheat from Chicago to New York at 12 cents a hundred, yes, at 10 cents a hundred. That, figured out at 10 cents a hundred for 1,000 miles between Chicago and New York, will make 2 mills per ton per mile. If 12 cents a hundred, it will make 2.24 mills per ton per mile, which is cheaper than it is claimed it costs to transport it on the Erie Canal—I agree that that is less than the cost of transportation. I agree, as the Senator says, that the railroad has to make up for the loss of doing business at that rate by recouping upon local traffic, but nevertheless the grain comes from Chicago to New York and comes at those rates.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It would not come at those rates if there were no canal there.

Mr. PLATT. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. MILLER. Allow me to say that as a practical fact nearly all the grain that comes to New York now at these rates comes by canal. The railroad is bringing scarcely any of it. When the canal closes then the railroad proceeds to bring it at a higher rate.

Mr. PLATT. Bear in mind my proposition, that in the future, before this canal can ever be completed, it is entirely probable that the cost of transportation by rail will be so far reduced that the canal can not further reduce it.

I want to call attention to some official figures showing what the cost of transportation really is per ton per mile upon the Pennsylvania Railroad Company's lines.

Mr. MILLER. Permit me to ask a question?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. I have read here a dispatch from a member of the Produce Exchange in Chicago stating that the present rate of freight from Chicago to New York by water is 6 cents per bushel for grain and that the present rate by rail is 15 cents per bushel. Does the Senator believe that within any reasonably near future, say within a century or two, the railroads will be bringing grain from Chicago to New York for less than 6 cents a bushel?

Mr. PLATT. I believe and I know they have been bringing it for 7 cents a bushel by rail within the past year. I do not know how much accuracy can be placed upon that dispatch. But I know the rates at which grain has been at times brought by rail from Chicago to New York.

Mr. MILLER. Does the Senator doubt the accuracy of that dispatch? I also read in connection with it a table made by Mr. Fink, the controller of the pool, giving substantially the same rates, stating that a year ago the water rate was 6.90 cents per bushel and that upon the railroads it was then about 13 to 15 cents a bushel. That was a year ago. To-day the rates are 6 and 15 cents. That comes from the table of Mr. Fink.

Mr. PLATT. I read from the testimony of Mr. Fink before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, page 92:

But when the railroads get into a fight, as some of them are at present, and when they charge 10 or 12 cents a hundred on grain from Chicago to New York less than the cost of transportation, &c.

Ten and 12 cents a hundred is from 6 to 7 cents a bushel, and he said it over and over again.

Mr. CULLOM. That is when they are in a fight.

Mr. PLATT. I am speaking of what has been done in a fight.

Mr. McMILLAN. Losing all the time.

Mr. PLATT. He says again:

Yet the roads carry grain for 12 cents and less.

They have been doing it; that is all I said.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator tell us why?

Mr. PLATT. On account of competition, as he alleges.

Mr. MILLER. On account of competition, he there alleges, with the canal.

Mr. PLATT. What he says is, that it is done when the railroads are in a fight.

Mr. MILLER. Does the Senator believe for a moment if the Erie Canal was closed up the railroads would not have an iron-bound pool and put the rates up to a point that would pay 10 per cent. on all their stock, besides interest on their bonds?

Mr. PLATT. I do not propose to be drawn off from the point of my argument. All this is of little consequence except to justify myself in what I said the other day that it had been done; what I set out to do was to give the actual cost of freight transportation on the Pennsylvania Railroad, but I can not get the opportunity.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will permit me to bring in a statement from the pool controller, showing that the railroads at a certain time carried freight much less than the actual cost. Can he make any argument out of that in regard to commerce in the future? It is war. Cut-throat policy can not long control it. The West Shore went out of existence, was taken up by the New York Central and so was the Nickel Plate road. There can be only one end to that kind of warfare. A fight in which the railroads charge less than it costs must end in consolidation, in a pool. It can end in nothing else.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator now admits that it was railroad competition, not canal competition, that brought down the rates.

But I started to put some official figures against the figures which have been given here to-day. The Senator says that it cost on the Erie Canal two years ago .27 of a cent per ton per mile. I hold him to that. I say that the actual cost of transportation of freight on some railroads has been brought down in this country almost to that figure, and I give official statements for it. I give the report of the Pennsylvania Railroad with reference to one of its own lines and the cost upon it. The railroad has not falsified that by reducing it too low.

I hold in my hand the thirty-ninth annual report of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for 1885, with the average cost of transporting each ton of freight per mile over all its lines—all kinds of freight; and the average cost of transporting each ton of freight one mile on the "Pennsylvania Railroad and its branches" was .391 of a cent per ton per mile. On the "United railroads of New Jersey and branches" it was .976 of a cent per ton per mile. That was a much higher rate than upon its other divisions. On the "Philadelphia and Erie Railroad," 287 miles in length—and to this I ask special attention—it was only .307 of a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. MILLER. Does that include fixed charges, or simply operating expenses?

Mr. PLATT. It is the entire average cost of transportation. It is cost we are talking about—the cost of transportation on the railroad as compared with the cost of transportation by the canal.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. PLATT. I will print the whole table in the RECORD. It is:

The following table shows the revenue and cost per ton per mile on each division operated by the company:

Freight.	Pennsylvania Railroad and branches.	United railroads of New Jersey and branches.	Philadelphia and Erie Railroad.	All lines east of Pittsburgh and Erie.
Length of road (miles)	1,515.72	445.10	287.56	2,248.38
Average earnings per ton per mile from transportation of freight	.627	1.249	.493	.695
Average cost of transporting each ton of freight one mile	.391	.976	.307	.460
Average profit per ton per mile	.236	.273	.191	.235

From the above table it will appear that the average rate per ton per mile in 1885 on the main line and branches shows a decrease, when compared with that of 1883, of 1.13 of a mill, and that the cost of transportation per ton per mile decreased .50 of a mill, showing a decrease of .63 of a mill in the profit per ton per mile.

The rate received on the united railroads of New Jersey division shows a decrease of 1.16 of a mill, and the cost of moving a decrease of 1.05 of a mill, showing a decreased profit of .11 of a mill.

On the Philadelphia and Erie division the earnings show a decrease of .78 of a mill, and the cost of movement a decrease of .58 of a mill, making a decrease in the profit of .20 of a mill.

The result upon all lines east of Pittsburgh and Erie was a decrease of .51 of a mill per ton per mile in the net profit from freight.

The cost on the canal was two hundred and seventy one thousandths of a cent per ton per mile; and yet the Pennsylvania Railroad has reduced the average cost of transportation of each ton of freight per mile on the Philadelphia and Erie division down to three hundred and seven one-thousandths of a cent per ton per mile, which is a very little over the cost of transportation upon the canal.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator give us the charges of the railroad? What was the charge per ton per mile?

Mr. PLATT. I will give it all. Taking all lines east of Pittsburgh and Erie, averaging the whole thing, the cost was only four hundred and sixty-one one-thousandths of a cent per ton per mile. It gives here the average earnings per ton per mile for the transportation of freight; it gives the average profit per ton per mile; gives the whole in the table, which will be printed in the RECORD. The average earnings per ton per mile is, of course, the average charge per ton per mile.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will see, of course, that there is some slight difference between 27 and 37.

Mr. PLATT. Twenty-seven and thirty or accurately two hundred and seventy one-thousandths of a cent per ton per mile cost of transportation on the Erie Canal, and three hundred and seven one-thousandths of a cent per ton per mile actual cost of transportation on the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad.

Mr. MILLER. But the fixed charges there do not include dividends upon the capital, and I am very sure the Senator does not expect a railroad to carry freight without paying dividends upon its stock. That covers the mere cost of transportation. That covers the cost of transportation for the fixed charges, which are simply the interest on the bonds.

Mr. PLATT. This table gives the average earnings per ton per mile for the transportation of freight. Where the average cost was only three hundred and seven thousandths of a cent per ton per mile the average earning was four hundred and ninety-eight thousandths of a cent per ton per mile and the profit was one hundred and ninety-one thousandths of a cent per ton per mile. Everything is included. This is an official statement of the average cost of transportation upon all the Pennsylvania lines.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator said he would read the charge per ton per mile. He has not done so.

Mr. PLATT. I give the earnings and the cost and the profits. The average earning per ton per mile is identical with the average charge per ton per mile.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me to interrupt him; I do not desire to interrupt him improperly, but he has referred to Mr. Fink as a witness upon whom reliance can be had as to what he states in reference to railroading. I just want to read one or two paragraphs.

Senator PLATT. When you suggest that 12 cents a hundred on grain from Chicago is less than the cost, what do you mean? Is it less than it costs to haul a particular train of cars from Chicago to New York, or less than the cost counting all the expenses of the road?

Mr. FINK. It is less than the actual cost of hauling the cars. The average cost on the roads between here and Chicago which are operated the cheapest is about 24 cents per 100 pounds, which includes the general expenses but does not allow anything for interest. Some classes of freight, such as grain, can be hauled for somewhat less than the average cost, because the average cost includes the more expensive local business; yet I do not think grain can be hauled for much less than about 20 cents, including general expenses; and the mere cost of movement can not be less than 15 cents. The cost of returning empty cars must be charged to this service. So the lowest actual cost is not reimbursed by a charge of 12 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Illinois need not have interrupted me to read what he has read, for I have admitted that 10 and 12 cents per hundred charged for grain from Chicago to New York was less than the cost of transportation. I do not know that I can make myself understood. I have not claimed that the cost of transportation on any railroad in the United States is less to-day than the cost of transportation upon the Erie Canal; but I have shown that the cost of transportation, according to the official figures of the annual report of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is very nearly as little on the Philadelphia and Erie division as it is on the Erie Canal.

Now take just what the Senator interrupted me to read. Suppose it does cost 20 cents, including general expenses and all expenses, per hundred to haul grain from Chicago to New York, how much is that? Four mills—four-tenths of a cent per ton per mile. The Erie Canal has got the cost of transportation down to 2.7 mills per ton per mile. The New York Central, on its Chicago line, Mr. Fink says can do it for 4 mills per ton per mile. The Pennsylvania Railroad does it for just a fraction over 3 mills on one of its divisions. Hence the difference between what the canal and a railroad can do in the matter of the cost of transportation is in this year 1886 but a trifle, and, as I said, the cost of transportation by railroad is being steadily reduced year by year. On the main line and branches of the Pennsylvania Railroad the cost of transportation per ton per mile was decreased in 1885, as shown in the report, a half of 1 mill and so it goes down year after year, and I think it requires no prophetic vision to foresee that, with continually improved facilities for reducing the cost of transportation, by the time this canal can be built the railroads will be able to transport freight as cheaply as it can be done by canal, although they may not do it.

The point of my remarks on Saturday was that if the Government wanted to compete with a railroad side by side for the same distance, the time was soon coming when it would have to do it with a railroad and not with a canal, unless the canal should be a level canal and a ship canal, by which I mean a canal through which ships can go without the interruption and cost of lockage. If you can build a ship-canal on a sea level or a river level and with practically no lockage, I think it is possible that side by side the canal for a few years to come may beat the railroad in the actual cost of transportation, but, as I said, it requires no prophetic vision to foresee that the time is coming in the near future when it will not be able to do it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate, as I am anxious to have a vote on this amendment, but I wish to notice something that has been said by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

The senior Senator from Illinois on Saturday just at the close of the session said that my opposition to this amendment was based upon the interests of the city of Saint Louis, and he assumed that I lived in that city and had some sort of local interest in opposing the Hennepin Canal. I hope no Senator here will think that any sort of personal feeling or local interest could affect me in a matter of this kind. But to end that sort of thing, I will say that I live on the western border of the State of Missouri, in Kansas City, and all the business connections of that city are with the city of Chicago. We have literally no connection in business or otherwise with the city of Saint Louis. If I had any personal or local feeling in the matter it would be for this canal, because it is a Chicago enterprise. The senior Senator from Illinois lives in the city of Chicago, and it would be a legitimate retort for me to say that when a man from Chicago taunts the citizen of any other place in this country with local feeling he should remember that the citizens of that place take care of Chicago in every phase of business. If they do not, I am more mistaken than I ever was as to any other proposition that can be submitted.

Mr. President, I repeat, notwithstanding these long and intricate arguments here on the canal question, that the days of canals are numbered. If we could inaugurate in this country a system of large canals where the canal-boats would carry from five to seven hundred or a thousand tons they might compete to a certain degree with railroads; but these small canals, carrying boats of less than 300 tons burden, are going out of existence, and they do not even form a factor of competition with the railroads of the country.

As I said the other day, look at the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal running into this city. The company has not enough money to-day to pay for the bridges washed away by the last freshet. What has become of the Lynchburg Canal, running down the James River? To-day the grass is growing on the canal tow-path, and why? Because railroads have destroyed it. The other day in the discussion of the Muskingum Canal scheme I read from the reports to show that a section of that canal from Zanesville running up 16 miles had been discontinued years ago on account of the construction of a railroad along its banks. It is useless for Senators to talk here about canals or any system of canals in this country.

I am not astonished at the speech of the Senator from New York. This is the preliminary skirmish-line to turning over his Erie Canal to the General Government. It is the most marvelous thing to me of all the marvelous things I have seen of results, that this splendid canal system of the country, so productive of dividends and of commerce, in every instance is unloaded upon the General Government. Ohio the other day unloaded Muskingum on us. The third State in the Union with an overflowing treasury can not keep up her canal. Illinois, the fourth State in the Union, comes now with another dilapidated canal scheme and unloads that on the General Government after making three millions from the grant by the General Government.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator misrepresents the State of Illinois. The State of Illinois is not offering to give this canal because it is any expense to the State, for it is not an old canal and it has been self-supporting ever since it was constructed.

Mr. VEST. So it has.

Mr. CULLOM. And is a source of revenue yet.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator had not been so eager to interrupt me he would have heard what I said. They have made nearly $3,000,000 clear profit; they have made a good business transaction of it, and now they put it on the General Government upon the condition that we are to construct the canal from Hennepin to the Mississippi River and enlarge the present one 80 feet wide and 7 feet deep at our expense and make it toll-free forever; and the next thing will be that New York will be unloading on us the Erie Canal, that splendid improvement. Mr. Conkling, the most distinguished member of the Republican party in the United States possibly, stood upon this floor with that rotund voice of his and boasted of the imperial State of New York with its imperial donation to the General Government free of toll. That is all to be ended, and at the next session of Congress there will be another unloading by New York, the first State in the Union, so as to keep even with the third and fourth States, all to be put upon the General Government, this splendid system of canals, as they call it, but none of them willing to compete with the most profitable investment at home.

All I ask of the Senator from New York is to do it in a straightforward, manly way, not to put it on a river and harbor bill, on the Commerce Committee, already damned in every direction, with all sorts of epithets piled upon its head, and more than one-half of the committee voting against it, as if they were ashamed of their own work—all I ask of the Senator from New York is to come up and make his proposition plainly and above-board, and ask for all he wants at once, not to stick it in under the guise of $300,000 in a river and harbor bill, and then talk about the jobs and combinations made to pass such a bill through the Senate. I listened to the Senator from New York to-day when he depicted the starving thousands of the poor working people of the country who want this money for their wives and children. How long will $300,000 meet their wants? How much clamor on the part of the starving thousands of this country would $300,000 allay and quiet?

There is a bill pending in the Senate now and one in the House to turn over this Michigan and Illinois Canal and construct the Hennepin Canal, which will cost, the engineers, say, $7,000,000. In my judgment it will cost $17,000,000, judging from past estimates in like directions. If this be the magnificent enterprise we have heard so much about, why do not the Senators who favor it stand upon those bills and fight it out in a fair parliamentary struggle? Why do they come and load this fatal and this miserable cargo of a bill with $300,000 in order to commit the General Government to the result, no matter what it may be?

Mr. President, I am sick and tired of having the Committee on Commerce made the dumping-ground for every old, miserable, broken-down engineering improvement scheme in this country. I want to improve the rivers and harbors of the country and will vote as much as any Senator, but I do not propose that State or individual improvidence shall be loaded off upon the Treasury of the United States if I can prevent it. States here that stand in the great galaxy of States at the very front in resources, in population, now come and say to the General Government, "We can not keep up these improvements, they are breaking down on our hands, we want the Treasury of the United States to become the recipient of our own speculation."

Talk about canals competing with railroads. I want to read from the report of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. Here is a report on interstate commerce from the committee of which he is chairman, giving the receipts by canal and rail in the five principal Atlantic seaboard cities:

Statement showing total receipts and exports of flour and grain at the five Atlantic cities—New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, and Montreal—during the years named below.

That is from 1860 to 1884, a quarter of a century.

Also percentages of each city of total receipts and exports.

Now I want Senators to listen. We are told you can take grain from Chicago to New York by canal and water for 6 cents, and you have to pay 15 cents, 9 cents more, to take it by rail. Is it not most astonishing that it does not all go by water? Is it not astonishing that there is not a rush to get to the water routes instead of the railroads? How is it? No people in the world understand their money interests better than the people of the United States. If we can save the fourth of a cent by going a mile we will always do it. No people understand it better. Now look at the receipts of grain and flour.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri will allow me to remind him that for six months of the year they can not do it by reason of frozen water.

Mr. VEST. Of course. I have the tables on that too. I suppose the same condition would apply to the Hennepin Canal. But I want to say now that the canal system of this country is going to the rear and the railroad system coming to the front gradually year by year, but steadily all the time.

From 1860 to 1884 New York received of these five cities 51.6 per cent. of all the grain and flour that was carried to the Atlantic seaboard—more than one-half; but now mark, in 1884, the last year, 16.9 per cent. was carried by canal and 33.6 per cent. by rail. With a difference in the cost of carrying it from Chicago to the seaboard of 9 cents a bushel, there was only 16.9 per cent. carried by canal and 33.6 by rail.

But I want to call attention to another most significant proposition coming from the committee of which the Senator from Illinois is chairman. In 1870, 27.9 per cent. of the grain and flour was carried by canal and 25.9 per cent. by rail; 2 per cent. more by canal than by rail. In 1871, there were carried 33.1 per cent. by canal and 21.7 per cent. by rail; in 1872, 29.7 per cent. by canal and 22.4 by rail; in 1873, 24.5 per cent. by canal and 27.5 by rail; in 1874, 24.6 per cent. by canal and 30 per cent. by rail; in 1875, 21.1 per cent. by canal and 30.1 by rail; in 1876, 15.6 per cent. by canal and 28.2 by rail; in 1877, 23.5 per cent. by canal and 24.8 by rail; in 1878, 21.76 per cent. by canal and 29.07 by rail; in 1879, 17.15 per cent. by canal and 30.66 by rail; in 1880, 20.33 per cent. by canal and 27.95 by rail; in 1881, 14.31 per cent. by canal and 36.91 by rail; in 1882, 15.13 per cent. by canal and 37.79 by rail; in 1883, 17.2 per cent. by canal and 33.1 by rail; and in 1884, the last year in this table, 16.9 per cent by canal and 33.6 by rail.

And yet gentlemen talk about the canal system of this country competing with railroads. It is hardly a factor in competition, and I say when you get a canal-boat with less than 300 tons burden it is absolutely throwing money away to talk about putting that in competition with a railroad; and the reason is manifest; all the world sees the result of it.

Look at our carrying trade on the ocean. We have lost it, and why? Because steam has taken the place of sail. When we could compete in wooden vessels we outstripped the world. When steam came into play and iron and steel vessels, England took the carrying trade away from us. It is the difference in speed, it is the difference in time; and in all this argument Senators on the opposite side of this question have overlooked that factor in the discussion. Time now is money, and the swiftest transportation is always the transportation that is the most profitable and that will be selected by the commercial public. A canal can not compete with a river or railroad.

The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] the other day spoke about this canal in competition with the great Mississippi River. Mr. President, a river without a lock or gate-keepers, with only the water that God has given it within its banks, and without any artificial means in order to make it, as a mode of transportation is far superior to any canal that can be constructed. The loss of time is one great element. The slowest train that could be put on a railroad would make the distance from Chicago to the Mississippi River in the time that would be occupied in opening the canal locks upon this route. You might as well compare an eagle to a bat, a race-horse to the commonest drudge that ever went through these streets, as to talk about one of these canals competing with a railroad or with a natural water course.

This is all I desire to say, Mr. President. I declare most positively that in my judgment this money, considering the amount to be expended, will be virtually thrown away. I have no personal interest or representative interest as in favor of the city of Saint Louis as against the city of Chicago. Saint Louis is dependent for her prosperity upon the State of Missouri and the States that are tributary to her geographically. If this little canal were constructed it would not affect the commerce of that great city or of the great Mississippi River.

The Senator from Illinois was kind enough to say that my State was as much interested as his, as we wanted communication also between the lakes and the Mississippi. Mr. President, there is already water communication. The Illinois River is being improved by the General Government, and in this very bill is an appropriation of $100,000 to improve the navigation of that stream; but that stream goes into the Mississippi River below the point at which this canal is to reach it. The object of this canal is to reach the State of Iowa and the grain States in the Northwest. It is not water communication between the lakes and the Mississippi River that they want, because they have it through the Illinois River. They want a communication for the benefit of certain cities, and for that alone. We are satisfied in Missouri. I do not oppose this on any sectional or local ground. I have opposed this project from the beginning two years ago, one year ago, and whenever it has come before the Senate. I believe it to be unconstitutional. I believe it to be unnecessary. I am utterly opposed to this whole method of States commencing internal improvement systems, and then unloading them upon the General Government when they think proper.

Mr. CULLOM. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to make one statement of fact from the record. The Senator refers to the fact that steam has taken the place of sail vessels, so that slow travel has gone out of date. I have a statement of the shipping built by all nations between the years 1871 and 1883, and it shows that there have been of steam vessels 637,000 tons, and of saling vessels 735,000, total 1,372,000 tons; steam 46 per cent., sailing vessels 54 per cent. So that steam has not taken possession of the world as thoroughly as the Senator suggests.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Illinois has had occasion to examine that question as thoroughly as he might have done he would have discovered that those steam vessels had the commerce of the world. The sailing vessels are now used in the coastwise trade, and in some countries where there are small freights, and along the coast where steam has not taken its place; but all the great transatlantic and trans-Pacific lines, all the great lines that do the commerce of the great commercial world, are propelled by steam. Steam has taken the place of sail in the commerce of the world. I say it emphatically; and iron and steel vessels have taken the place of wood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FRYE in the chair.) On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PLUMB addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill at this time, which I dislike very much to do, as it is out of order; but in an appropriation bill that I suppose will reach the Senate in a very short time there is a provision making a permanent arrangement of law concerning the fees and compensations of United States commissioners of circuit courts, which, as we think in the Senate, has no place in an appropriation bill.

There are improprieties or inconsistencies in the existing state of the law as it has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States about the fees and emoluments of commissioners of circuit courts that ought to be corrected. Therefore I ask at this time unanimous consent to introduce a bill on that subject, in the hope that before the appropriation bill to which I refer comes before the Senate we may be in readiness to take some separate and proper action upon that subject on a bill where it belongs.

The bill (S. 2836) to limit and regulate the fees and compensation of commissioners of circuit courts of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have stated a certain sum in the bill as the limit of compensation of these officers. I have stated that merely at random. It may be too little and it may be too much.

Mr. BROWN. What is the amount?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Fifteen hundred dollars. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2837) relative to the location of the town site of Wallace, Kans.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2838) for the relief of the Baptist Female College of Lexington, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 2839) for the relief of the Church of the Ascension in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask for an order at this time to withdraw the papers in the case of Warren Mitchell, of Kentucky, now on file.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the papers in the case of Warren Mitchell be withdrawn from the files.

Mr. BLACKBURN. For use in the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the order will be granted.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 325) granting a pension to Catharine Waters was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committe on Pensions.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 181) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Southwestern Iowa and Northwestern Missouri Veteran Soldiers' Association, at Bethany, Mo., and to the Tri-State Veterans' Association of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, for reunion purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9478) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1006) for the relief of James W. Schaumburg, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2840) for the relief of the legal representatives of James W. Schaumburg; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1993) for the relief of St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal church in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

NORTHERN CHEYENNE INDIANS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of 3d instant, with inclosures, from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending legislative authority for the use of funds from appropriation, Sioux, &c., 1887, for the subsistence of certain Northern Cheyenne Indians who have gone, or who may go, from the Sioux reservation in Dakota to the Tongue River Indian agency or vicinity in Montana.

The matter is presented for the favorable consideration of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CALL and Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, in section 1, to insert the following clauses from line 1134 to line 1174, inclusive, as amended:

The grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its rights of way, and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State of Illinois may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State of Illinois by the United States for canal purposes, made to the United States by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois approved April 28, 1882, be, and is hereby, accepted on the terms and conditions specified in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

For the construction of a canal from the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, to the Mississippi River, at or above the mouth of Rock River, in said State, together with such feeders and other works that may be necessary to supply said canal with water, $300,000. Said canal shall be known as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and shall be constructed on such route as may be determined by the Secretary of War: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in order to secure the right of way for such canal and feeders, to acquire the title to such lands as may be necessary by agreement, purchase, or voluntary conveyance from the owners, if it can be done on reasonable terms; but if that shall be found impracticable, then the Secretary of War shall apply at any term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to be held thereafter, at any general or special term held in said district, and in the name of the United States institute and carry on proceedings to condemn such lands as may be necessary for right of way as aforesaid; and in such proceedings said court shall be governed by the laws of the State of Illinois, so far as the same may be applicable to the subject of condemning private property for public use: Provided further, That said canal shall be 80 feet wide at the water-line and 7 feet deep, with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and all other erections and fixtures that may be necessary for safe and convenient navigation of said canal and branch as specified in said survey.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything during the discussion upon this bill, and I should not have done so except for the suggestion made on yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] concerning the amendments which have been proposed to the bill by the Senate Committee on Commerce.

Under our system of government certain powers are delegated to the General Government. Among those powers is the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign countries. Congress has claimed, and the courts have decided, that the power to regulate commerce includes the power of regulating the means of transportation. Congress claims the power of controlling the navigable rivers of the country, of preventing and authorizing obstructions to them, of determining what works for the improvement of navigation shall be attempted or made, and we have entered upon the work of improving the harbors and rivers of the country.

There is no longer I think any serious question as to the constitutional power of Congress to improve the harbors and the great water ways of the country.

It appears to me that in considering the question as to whether any improvement shall be undertaken we ought first to consider the question as to whether it is a necessary improvement, whether it will be beneficial to commerce, whether its relative importance compared with other improvements being made and which ought to be undertaken is sufficient to warrant its commencement at the present time, and whether the condition of the Treasury is such as to justify the necessary expenditure. I think this grant of power carries with it an obligation on the part of the General Government to exercise it for the general welfare to the extent of the ability of the Government and in an intelligent and impartial manner.

I therefore do not think with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that the question of how much has been recommended for the improvement of rivers and harbors by the Secretary of War, whether he reflects the opinions of the executive department of the Government or not, should be the criterion by which to judge of the amount which should be appropriated in a river and harbor bill.

I do not think the question of how much has been agreed upon in another branch of the legislative department of this Government as the amount which shall be appropriated should govern us. If we are to be controlled by the action of a committee in another branch of Congress, or by another branch of Congress in regard to the amount which shall be appropriated for rivers and harbors and the manner in which it is to be distributed, we had better discharge the Committee on Commerce and take the bill and pass it in the Senate without a reference at all, but in the shape in which it comes from the House.

I do not desire to criticise the bill as it came from the House, and I shall not do so in a manner to reflect upon the House or its committee; but if we are to judge by the estimates that were made by local engineers and which were transmitted through the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War to Congress for its information and government it was an unequal bill. The total amount of the estimates was something over $42,000,000. The amount appropriated by the bill as it came from the House was $15,182,200. Out of that amount the State of Oregon, if we include in the appropriations made for that State the appropriation for the Columbia River (a matter to which I shall allude directly), received less than 20 per cent. of the estimates. Other States received 50 per cent.; other States still more. I shall not undertake to point out the States which had received 50 per cent. or more of the estimates, nor shall I undertake to state or speculate as to the reasons for this inequality, but I will state in general terms that Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri received, including the appropriation made for the improvement of the Lower Mississippi River, $7,225,000 out of a total of $15,182,200.

Yesterday the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] said that as the bill came from the House the State of Oregon had received $685,000. The Senator was in error. With all the appropriations for the Columbia River included the total amount appropriated for Oregon improvements in the bill as it came from the House was $605,000. If we add $1,000 appropriated for gauging the waters of the Columbia River the total amount in the bill as it came from the House for the State of Oregon would be $606,000.

Of this $605,000, $150,000 was appropriated for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River; $100,000 for the Lower Columbia and the Lower Willamette, a section of the Willamette of only 12 miles; $200,000 for the construction of the Cascade locks, and $10,000 for the Upper Columbia, making a total of $460,000 for the Columbia River.

The Columbia River forms a portion of the boundary between Oregon and Washington Territory. It entirely crosses that Territory. The Snake River, for which a portion of the appropriation is made, extends into Idaho Territory. But if we assume that one-half of the appropriation for Columbia River should be charged to Oregon the total amount of the appropriation for Oregon in the bill as it came from the House would be only $375,000.

The increased appropriations proposed by the Senate committee for the Columbia River and improvements in Oregon amount to $185,000. I propose to show that if I had not asked that increase of the committee my constituents would have had just cause to complain, and if the committee had not granted it they would not have done justice to those improvements, nor have dealt fairly with the State I in part represent. The Columbia River takes its rise in the Rocky Mountains, at 50° 20′ north latitude, and runs north to 50° 10′, makes the detour of the great bend of the Columbia, crosses Washington Territory, turns westward, and forces its way through the Cascade Mountains and on to the sea.

It is the second river in magnitude upon the continent. Unlike the Mississippi, as we have heard this morning from the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], it runs parallel to the great lines of trade and transportation. Its banks are stable. It can be improved from its mouth for 1,000 miles with less money than has been expended upon the Mississippi River, and when it is once improved the improvements will stand for ages without the necessity for any considerable appropriations, but with the expenditures of small sums annually to keep the works in repair.

From the mouth of the Columbia River to Portland, which is the chief commercial city on the Pacific Northwest, a distance of 122 miles, the Columbia River and the Lower Willamette form a great national highway. The flags of the maritime nations may be seen in the harbor of Portland. The plan for the improvement of that 122 miles contemplates obtaining 20 feet of water at all seasons of the year. Four hundred and seven thousand dollars, we are told by the local engineers, would complete the permanent improvement in accordance with present plans, consisting of wing-dams at the bars and dredging; so that hereafter there need be no considerable expenditure upon it. They state that $407,000 could be expended the present fiscal year. The bill as it came from the House gave but $100,000—less than 25 per cent. of the amount. Twenty-eight thousand dollars of that is to be expended for building a dredge-boat to be used both on the Columbia and Willamette, leaving but $72,000 for river improvement, and the Committee on Commerce have not increased the amount.

From the mouth of the Willamette to the Lower Cascades, 53 miles, the river is navigable for vessels drawing 10 feet and over. At the Cascades the navigation is interrupted by rapids for a distance of 6 miles. There is where the Government is building a canal and locks.

From the Cascades to the Dalles, 45 miles, there are from 8 to 10 feet of water. Then comes the obstruction of the Dalles, some 15 miles in length.

Above the Dalles the river is being improved up to Lewiston, on the Snake River, a distance of 266 miles. The plan for that improvement was adopted many years ago. The total estimate for the work was $132,000. Ninety-six thousand dollars have been appropriated heretofore. The engineers recommend the appropriation of the remaining $36,000. The improvement consists in removing large bowlders and blasting away rocks in the rapids. Any other member of the committee for such a work in his State would have insisted that that small sum of $36,000 to complete that improvement should have been appropriated at once, but the House gave us $10,000 out of the $36,000—less than 30 per cent. of the amount, and it was not increased.

From Celile, at the upper end of the Dalles, to Priest Rapids in the Columbia is 200 miles. From Priest Rapids above for a distance of 150 miles the river can be improved without locks so as to be navigable at a cost of $400,000. That has been recommended for several years and no appropriation for it has been made. Above this point the Columbia River is navigable for 450 miles with three interruptions which could be easily removed, making in all a navigable river of a thousand miles in length.

The principal increase of the appropriation for the Oregon improvements was for the canal and locks at the Cascades and for the work at the mouth of the river. A few days ago, in discussing another bill, I described the situation at the Cascades of the Columbia. The Cascade Mountains separate Oregon and Washington into two parts. The Columbia River forces its way down through a gap in the mountains, and all the produce of the great basin of the Columbia, an empire in extent, is forced to come down through this gorge. I can not better describe it than to read an extract from the report of the Committee on Commerce taken from the report of the local engineers. I will pass it to the Secretary and ask him to read what is marked on pages 282 and 283.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is an extraordinary position. It is the key point in the commercial strategy of the Pacific Northwest. With its waters freely open to navigation, and with railroads along either bank, the whole region will be insured minimum freight rates, and there will result a development in population and material wealth such as is hard to realize. The greater part of the magnificent country drained by the Columbia River is cut off from a sea outlet by the north and south trending mountain mass of the Cascade Mountains. It is a broad, massive range, capped with a layer of volcanic outpourings at least 4,000 feet thick, and dotted here and there along its axis with snow-clad cones, which reach altitudes equaling the highest points of the backbone ridge of the continent.

Through this great ridge no other pass exists at such an altitude as can hope to divert the east-west channel of commerce along the Columbia River. "The longest way around" through this horizontal pass will always be a shorter haul than any other line, plus the vertical distance over the mountains. The area of the Columbia River region is estimated at 245,000 square miles. It drains the western slopes of the main range of the Rocky Mountains, its drainage basin extending between latitudes 41° and 53° north, or over 12 degrees of latitude. Owing to this great range in latitude, involving considerable variation in climate, an opportunity is afforded for an average in the water discharge of the low river, and hence the annual flood presents itself with great precision in the month of June, but varying in quantity in a manner which depends upon the quantity of precipitation, and also upon the relative distribution of heat through the season.

Mr. DOLPH. An estimate is also given here, which has been read by the Secretary, of the area that is drained by the Columbia River and its tributaries. It is given at 244,959 square miles. To better understand the magnitude of these figures I will make a few comparisons. The total area of the following States, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia, amounts to 244,260 square miles—less than the area drained by the Columbia River and its tributaries. The area of Great Britain and Ireland is 121,230 square miles, of France 201,900 square miles, of Germany 212,001 square miles, of Austria-Hungary 226,406 square miles, of Italy 112,677 square miles, and of Spain 182,758 square miles. So it will be seen that the area drained by the Columbia River and its tributaries is larger than any one of these European countries.

My colleague yesterday presented some statistics to show the fertility and productiveness of this vast region, to show the necessity for completing this work at the Cascades in order that the river transportation might be brought into competition with transportation by rail, and to show the excessive freight charges which are made from different central points in the vast inland empire drained by the Columbia River to Portland by reason of the railroad company possessing this strategic point upon the Columbia River. The United States Government has undertaken to remove the obstructions to navigation at the Cascades. The rapids are known as the Lower Cascades and Upper Cascades. The project is to build a canal and locks around the Upper Cascades and to improve the Lower Cascades by blasting out rocks and removing the obstructions, so that the river at this point may be navigated and boats may pass up and down laden except during the very highest stage of water.

There has already, according to my recollection, been appropriated and expended upon this work some $950,000. The amount estimated as necessary to complete the project in accordance with the modified plan is $1,250,000. The engineers reported that $750,000 could be used to advantage the present year. That was the estimate, but the bill as it came to the Senate carried an appropriation of only $200,000, or about 27 per cent. of the estimate.

The amendment which I asked the committee to make and which they did make adds $50,000 to this appropriation, making the entire amount only 33⅓ per cent. of the estimate, while the entire amount appropriated by the bill as it comes from the Senate committee is about 43 per cent. of the entire estimates. So that even for this great work, which as no one will deny is a national work, which as no one will deny is a work of great importance, which should be completed at the earliest possible moment, from the fact that no benefit whatever can be derived from past appropriations until it is completed, receives less than its proportion of the appropriations carried by the bill.

The principal increase made by the Senate committee in the appropriations for Oregon, if you choose to call the appropriations for the Columbia River appropriations for that State, was made for the improvement of the mouth of the river. All the produce which comes down from the great Columbia basin passes out, and must for many years to come pass out, of the mouth of the Columbia. Next to San Francisco the ports on the Columbia River are the principal ports on the Pacific slope.

Some years ago a board of engineers was appointed under the provisions of an act of Congress to examine the mouth of the river and report as to the practicability of its improvement and to report a plan. They reported a plan which is estimated to cost $3,710,000, not including their estimate for the contingencies, which was 25 per cent. additional.

Upon the north side of the river there is an elevated point of land and a permanent spit extending out into the river and forming a natural jetty. The plan of the improvement is to build a jetty from the south side, commencing near Fort Stevens and extending in a northwesterly direction to within about 3 miles of Cape Disappointment, thus narrowing the river, which is 6 or 7 miles in width there, to 3 miles. There is no doubt that the work is practicable and will secure at least 30 feet of water upon the bar at low water. The last Congress made an appropriation of $100,000 to commence the work. That appropriation has been expended. The House placed in the present river and harbor bill an appropriation of $150,000 for this great work. I made a calculation as to how long it would take to complete the work by appropriations of that amount.

The estimate was $1,330,000, so that the amount given by the House was about 11 per cent. of the estimate. My calculation showed that if there should be a river and harbor bill every two years, and we could secure an appropriation in every bill of $150,000, and such appropriation could be economically used, and the work which was done one year would not be destroyed the next for lack of appropriations, it would take fifty years to complete the improvement, and if we make an allowance for contingencies it would probably take about twice that period, or about three generations, to complete the improvement.

I therefore asked the Committee on Commerce to increase the amount of this appropriation, and they did increase it to $250,000, which is only about 19 per cent. of the estimate of the amount which the engineers say could be profitably expended the present fiscal year. I appeal to any Senator who listens to me to day to say if that was not a proper amendment, and if that work is going to be continued it ought not to be completed within the lifetime of some child now living in Oregon.

There is another thing which I might mention in this connection. A few years ago a bill was passed providing for a harbor of refuge upon the Pacific coast. A great many people do not understand the extent of the Pacific coast. From Cape Farewell to the southern boundary of California the distance is 1,650 miles—one-third of all our seacoast. From the northern boundary of Maine to the southern boundary of Georgia is 1,430 miles. Situated upon this coast line are thirteen States bounded in whole or in part by the Atlantic Ocean and represented here by twenty-six Senators. From the mouth of the Columbia River to the harbor at San Francisco the distance is 550 miles, and with the exception of two or three small harbors that we are asking money of Congress to improve there is not a place on all that coast where a ship in distress can take refuge in case of a storm. There is not a place between Puget Sound and the Golden Gate except the mouth of the Columbia where large ships such as are used in the coasting trade there can take refuge.

So, in improving the mouth of the Columbia we are creating a harbor of refuge for vessels engaged in foreign and in coastwise trade upon that long exposed coast.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress I have mentioned that a board of engineers was appointed to locate a harbor of refuge on that coast. They were not limited to any State. They might locate it upon the coast of California or the coast of Oregon.

After examining the several locations they located it at Port Orford, in the State of Oregon. An appropriation of $150,000 was made to commence it, but when it was ascertained that it might cost $5,000,000 to $7,000,000 to construct a harbor of refuge of first class there, the Secretary of War, on account of its great cost, declined to expend the money; and notwithstanding I have introduced bills here from time to time providing for the expenditure of that money, it stands to the credit of that work to-day and is unexpended, and the work has not been commenced and is not liable to be commenced, because the Committee on Commerce think it is better to appropriate money for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River, which will serve a double purpose of removing the obstruction to navigation there and creating a harbor of refuge.

As I have said, the bill came to the Senate with an appropriation of a little over 10 per cent. of the estimate for this great work, and attention is called to the fact that it has been increased in a manner apparently intended as a criticism of the committee.

I have taken the pains to make a computation as to the amount which has been appropriated for all the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains. Those States and Territories, that is, the four Territories and the three States, contain 776,334 square miles. The total area of the States and Territories, excluding Alaska, is 3,008,616 square miles, 2,232,283 square miles lying east of the Rocky Mountains. More than one-fourth of all the territory lies west of the Rocky Mountains, and out of this river and harbor bill of $18,000,000 and over California, Oregon, and Nevada, and Washington Territory, and all the other Territories receive $1,109,000.

I am not complaining about this. I would not have said a word in regard to this bill and what I consider to be not a very fair division of the appropriation, at least if the appropriations are to be based upon the estimates, except for the suggestions of the Senator from Kansas. I merely wished to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that the increase which is proposed to be made to the bill by the Senate committee for works in Oregon has been made for works of great and national importance, and that the amendments are proper amendments, amendments for which the Senate committee deserve commendation. If all the appropriations for the Columbia River are included in the Oregon appropriations, Oregon gets but 26 and a fraction per cent. of the estimates; while, as I said before, the per cent. of appropriations on the estimates in the bill as it came from the House was 35 per cent. and a fraction, and the per cent. of appropriations in the bill as it came from the Senate committee to the Senate was 43 per cent. of the estimates. I do not suppose any one will object to these amendments, but I desire now, once for all, as so much has been said about the amount that has been appropriated for Oregon, to show that the appropriations made for the great Columbia River, the second river on the continent, were all charged up to the State of Oregon, and that even in the bill as reported by the Senate committee Oregon is not receiving so large a proportion of the estimates as the appropriations for the other States aggregate and that nearly every other State has received.

Mr. HEARST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly; and I shall answer it if I can.

Mr. HEARST. What is the estimate that will make the harbor safe at the mouth of the Columbia River?

Mr. DOLPH. The original estimate was $3,710,000, of which $100,000 has been expended, and it is proposed to appropriate $250,000 by the present bill.

Mr. HEARST. Does not the Senator think that it would have been better to have spent the whole of the appropriations at the mouth of the river?

Mr. DOLPH. There can be no two opinions about that, and that is why I am so urgent in having enough money to make a showing there; and upon that point, if the Senator will permit me, I will read first from the report of the board of engineers who recommended this plan what they say about large appropriations.

> In conclusion, the board thinks it important to state that in an undertaking of this character, where the exposure is so great, as large a portion as possible of the whole estimate should be available before the beginning of actual construction, and the work, when commenced, should be carried forward as rapidly as practicable, with a view of attaining at the earliest day the desired object, namely, a deep channel to the sea to accommodate the great and growing commerce of which the Columbia River must be the avenue, and to the growth of which the present condition of the bar is a very formidable obstacle. When operations have once begun there should be no suspension of them, as in such a case, besides the loss of time, injuries to the unfinished work and unfavorable changes in shoals and channels may be expected to such an extent as very greatly to increase the cost.

I also received a letter, dated the 29th of January, 1884, which I incorporated in a speech I made on the subject of an improvement of the Columbia River, I think on the 7th of March, 1884, from which I read the concluding portion. It is from the engineer who is now in charge of the work, Capt. Charles F. Powell:

> When considering the probable cost of the Columbia jetty it should be noticed that the estimate of the majority of the board of engineers ($3,710,000) is based on a stone and beton block construction, although the use of wood is recommended in part if found to be more economical. Now, experience at the Oregon coast jetties does show that wood, in shape of piles and brush, can be advantageously and economically used, and the estimate for the Columbia jetty should be reduced considerably. The very liberal contingency named in the estimate of the board can be omitted in case of large and prompt appropriations; but not, on account of danger to destruction of an incomplete work at a place of great exposure, for small and irregular appropriations.

That explains the necessity for a large appropriation at the mouth of the Columbia, and it shows, in view of the magnitude of this work, that the amount appropriated in the bill as it came from the House is totally inadequate, and I may even say that of the appropriation in the bill as it now stands.

Now, one word more. The Senator from Kansas will not find in the appropriations for Oregon or Washington Territory any of the streams which he has criticised as being marsh streams. The two smallest appropriations in the bill as it came from the House are an appropriation for the improvement of the Upper Columbia and one for the Upper Willamette River. The appropriation for the Upper Columbia is to carry out a plan for the improvement of the river for 266 miles navigable for steamboats drawing 4½ feet of water. That is an appropriation for which $10,000 is given. The improvement of the Upper Willamette, for which $10,000 is given, is an improvement of a stretch of river about 125 miles in length, which, with some wing-dams, dredging the bars, and removing snags, may be kept in a navigable condition nearly all the year round. Those, I say, are the smallest appropriations made for these works, and they are not subject to criticism.

Mr. HEARST. As there is not enough money appropriated for some places and there may be too much money for others, I ask the Senator if it would not be better to take all the appropriations and put them on the mouth of the river and let the other works stand for the present?

Mr. DOLPH. That matter has been discussed here thoroughly by the Senator from New York, and permit me to say that I agree entirely with all that he said in regard to the importance of these minor improvements. It is not practicable, the time never will come, we may just as well take it as a fact that the time never will come when Congress will consent to pick out a few great harbors of this country and appropriate money for their improvement and leave the rest unprovided for. The wants of the people of the different portions of the country, the necessities of the commerce of the country, will not permit it. The duties which members of the Senate and House owe to their constituents will never permit them to vote for a bill which will omit the minor improvements. I do not believe if the Senator from Kansas who criticises this bill were permitted to take his pencil and given carte blanche to strike out from the bill he could eliminate appropriations amounting to $50,000 which after reading the reports and examining the whole matter he would be willing to say were not reasonable and proper.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Now I hope we can have a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending amendment.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to delay the Senate. I wish to make a few very brief observations upon the pending amendment.

I concur entirely in the constitutional view and in the expediency of river and harbor appropriations as read by the Senator from New York from Mr. Webster to-day. I believe that the interest of this country as well as the duty of Congress under the Constitution demands a liberal system of internal improvements and appropriations adequate for them.

I can see no difference in reason between the improvement of any stream, whether small or great, that is capable of contributing in any material and important respect to the general commerce of the country. I think the idea is entirely unreasonable that a bale of cotton which may be borne upon the Mississippi River and goes into either the interstate commerce or the foreign commerce of the country is an object of national importance and a bale of cotton borne upon any other river or stream and that bears the same relation to commerce, foreign or interstate, is not a matter of national concern; that the product loses its character and importance because of the locality from which it comes.

Certainly there is a difference between large things and small things, and the attention of Government can not be directed to every small particle of commerce that is to be found in the country; but every locality has its right to the aid of the Government if any other part has it, and there should be an equal distribution of the benefits of the Government in appropriations in aid of commerce without respect to whether it is in one locality or in another. If the commerce of one part be smaller than another, it is of course entitled to a smaller degree of aid; but if larger, it is entitled to a larger degree.

In regard to this amendment, the inclination of my mind is to vote for it, and yet it opens very large questions. The suggestions of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] are worthy of the most careful consideration. I do not believe that you will ever regulate the internal commerce of this country, the rates of transportation upon its wide and vastly increasing railroad system, by any canals or water routes. I think that will require the aid of positive legislation. I agree with him that this is a question which confronts Congress to-day, and that the interests of the people demand that instead of wasting our time upon more unimportant considerations it should be devoted to this great question which, as was read from Governor Seymour to-day and Mr. Webster, concerns the happiness and prosperity of the country more than any other, the economy of transportation, and if we are wise we will direct our attention to it.

But there is no evidence to my mind that is satisfactory that these great water ways of commerce—canals and water routes—will be entirely superseded. They are building them in the immediate vicinity of the great railroads in England. There is the Manchester Canal. It is true it is a ship-canal, but it is demanded by the impossibility of making the railroads subserve all the purposes of commerce; and I find in the reports of the Board of Trade of New York and elsewhere the distinction which the Senator from Missouri did not make between freights which do not require rapid transportation and those which do, and I find that the entire Northwest and all the Northern States are in favor of this appropriation for this improvement, because they believe that the great mass of the agricultural production does not require the most rapid transit and that it can be more cheaply transported on a water way, and that this fact will be an important factor in reducing the cost of railway transportation.

Now, while it seems to me that the Illinois River is the natural outlet for that country, and that improvements connecting it with the lakes and making steamboat communication without change from the Mississippi to the lakes, which can be easily done on the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, as it would appear from the map even to a person who is not an engineer would be far more easy than this canal; while to my mind the best improvement for the people of the Northwest would be to improve the Illinois River as a natural outlet for steamboat transportation with locks adequate to their transfer from the river to a canal to the lakes without breaking bulk, yet I find the entire sentiment of the people of the North and Northwest in favor of this appropriation and this improvement.

As the Senator from Missouri has said, it is an appropriation which looks particularly to the State of Iowa and the adjacent States and the interests of Chicago and that section, but I see no objection to the amendment in that. They have a right to the same benefits that every other section of the country has, and in proportion to their extended commerce and the business which they do and propose to do they ought to receive more liberal appropriations from the Government in aid of it.

For these reasons I am prepared to vote for this amendment, and yet I think the distributions of this bill are not fair. I think the principle should be that when the Government has commenced certain public works an obligation results to carry on the works already commenced, and to carry them on adequately by giving them appropriations sufficient to complete them in a reasonable time, and not to neglect them for other works or to commence new works to their disadvantage.

It can not be expected that perfect fairness shall be attained with the conflicting interests which attend the subject, but there should be some fair principle adopted on which the money should be expended so as to benefit all the people and every part of the country. It can not be expected that any part of the country will be content to be neglected, and you can not improve any avenue of commerce without benefiting the whole country.

I think, therefore, that this bill should be regulated not altogether by States, nor yet in disregard of States, but that it should be regulated chiefly by the necessity of the appropriation for the works already commenced; and in that respect I think that the bill might have been far more equal and just than it is.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). Upon this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], who is detained from the Senate by illness in his family as I understand. As I am not advised how he would vote on this amendment if present, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB (when Mr. MORGAN'S name was called). The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. I do not know how either of them would vote if present.

Mr. EDMUNDS (when Mr. MORRILL'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MORRILL] is absent ill, and is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I am under the impression—but I do not speak by authority—that my colleague, if present, would vote in the negative on this point.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but his colleague is under the impression that he would vote against this amendment if he were here, and I am informed he always has done so. Under these circumstances I feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1181, after the word "improvement," to strike out the words:

And the money heretofore appropriated for locks and dams is hereby made available for dredging said river, according to the plan of the Chief of Engineers, recommended on the 12th of March, 1884: Provided, That not exceeding $30,000 shall be thus expended on Goose Rapids.

And insert:

From Breckenridge to the northern boundary line of the United States, including dredging, removal of snags and bowlders, and construction of wing-dams, &c.; and the money heretofore appropriated for locks and dams is hereby made available for this purpose.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Red River of the North; Minnesota: Continuing improvement from Breckenridge to the northern boundary line of the United States, including dredging, removal of snags and bowlders, and construction of wing-dams, &c.; and the money heretofore appropriated for locks and dams is hereby made available for this purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1201, after the word "operations," to strike out "and the cost of the proceedings hereinafter authorized" and insert "$10,000 to complete dredges authorized by act of July 5, 1884;" and after the word "mining," at the end of line 1205, to insert "hurtful to navigation;" so as to read:

Improving Sacramento and Feather Rivers, California, $40,000 of the money heretofore appropriated for improving said rivers that may remain unexpended at the end of the present fiscal year, for snagging and dredging operations; $10,000 to complete dredges authorized by act of July 5, 1884; the balance of said unexpended money not to be used until the Secretary of War be satisfied that hydraulic mining hurtful to navigation has ceased on said rivers and their tributaries.

The next amendment was, at the end of the clause making an appropriation for "improving Sacramento and Feather Rivers, California," in line 1207, after the word "tributaries," to strike out the words:

If he be not satisfied, he is hereby instructed to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining, into either of said rivers or any of its tributaries, or into the San Joaquin River or any of its tributaries, or in or to such place or situation from which such detritus, débris, or slickens may be liable to be washed or carried by storms or floods into either of said rivers or tributaries; and he is hereby instructed to use out of said sum as much as may be necessary for said purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1222, to increase the appropriation for "improving canal at the Cascades, Oregon: Continuing improvement," from $200,000 to $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STANFORD. I wish to turn back a little to page 50. I want to amend the original text by inserting, after the words "hydraulic mining," in line 1210 of section 1, these words:

By water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure.

Mr. HOAR. That is all struck out.

Mr. STANFORD. I want to have the amendment disagreed to and insert these words in the original text. There is a prior appropriation made for the improvement of the Sacramento and Feather Rivers of California, $40,000 of which money is hereby appropriated "for improving said rivers." Now, this also contains a provision that the United States district attorney may use a part of that money for the prosecution of those people who may be impairing the navigation of the streams. If the hydraulic mining of a certain kind which I propose to prohibit is to go on unimpeded, it is useless for the Government to appropriate money for the improvement of that river.

The original text also provides for the San Joaquin River. The improvement of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin Rivers, or those portions which are affected by the hydraulic mining is clearly within the jurisdiction of the United States Government; they are all tide water, at any rate in the main. It is a small appropriation, but it may be effective to prevent this particular kind of mining which is destructive to the navigation of these two rivers. The importance of it to California can not be overestimated. I trust there will be no objection to the adoption of my amendment and the restoration of the original text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chair will consider that the amendment referred to has not been adopted, as it was passed on hurriedly, and the Senator from California offers an amendment to the portion proposed to be stricken out, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1210, after the word "mining," it is proposed to insert "by water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure;" so as to read:

If he be not so satisfied, he is hereby instructed to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining, by water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure, into either of said rivers or any of its tributaries, or into the San Joaquin River or any of its tributaries, or in or to such place or situation from which such detritus, débris, or slickens may be liable to be washed or carried by storms or floods into either of said rivers or tributaries; and he is hereby instructed to use out of said sum as much as may be necessary for said purpose.

Mr. INGALLS. My attention was called to this subject by a bill that was before the Senate some year or two ago, and my understanding at that time was that it was considered to be the duty of the State of California to attend to the methods that were adopted in mining by its own citizens in regions which are at a remote distance from the rivers that are affected by the bill.

If I understand this process, in the upper regions where these rivers take their rise scores, or it may be hundreds, of miles from the mouth, the waters are directed by means of sluices and nozzles and spouts from pipes against great banks of gold-bearing earth, which are washed away, the gold being arrested by some process and the débris or mud allowed to run off through these ravines down a great many miles into the water course below, by means of which not only have the channels of the streams become obstructed but vast areas of arable land have been overflowed and practically destroyed by the subsidence of these streams and the deposit of the unproductive mud upon the alluvion of the valley.

It seemed very strange to the committee that the United States Government should be invited to interpose to prevent the operations of these miners in the uplands of California lying at the foot of the mountains where these streams take their rise, to prevent citizens of that State from such mining operations as result in the choking up of these channels and the destruction of the fertility of the State; and I should like to hear the Senator from California state to the Senate upon what ground of reason or justice the United States can be called upon to expend money not only to improve the channels of these rivers, but to punish citizens of California, who are the subjects of the laws of that State and who certainly can be controlled by the laws of the State, from carrying on enterprises that are destructive to the navigable streams and also to the fertile and arable lands of California.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Kansas refers to the state of the law as it now stands, I beg to remind him that the law has been resorted to there and with success in the State courts and in the circuit court of the United States to enjoin that sort of thing. The judicial courts have taken jurisdiction of the affair.

Mr. INGALLS. So that the remedy is in the hands of the people there.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire, to understand that point exactly, how can the United States circuit court get jurisdiction? By reason of the citizenship of the parties?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the same ground that they get jurisdiction of any other case in which a citizen of Massachusetts or Vermont is concerned against the citizen of some other State.

Mr. HOAR. But this is not a law to provide for a private party's protecting his land against another private party or against a nuisance. It is a public law, and the proceeding is to be in the name of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not speaking of anything in this bill, but of the state of things as it has existed heretofore.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think I make myself clear. This, as I understand, is to provide for proceedings by the public, by the United States Government, under its power to protect commerce among the States; and I supposed the amendment of the Senator from California to the original bill proceeded on the ground that these two named streams, the Sacramento and the San Joaquin, are important highways of commerce among the States or with foreign countries. That being the case, I understand the authority of the United States is invoked to prevent the obstruction of those channels of commerce as it might be invoked on admiralty principles or other ground of jurisdiction in regard to harbors. I do not see how that can be affected by the circuit or other courts of the United States in consequence of the citizenship of anybody on the ground of citizenship without this law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither do I; but I was only suggesting historically to my friend from Kansas that under the state of the law, national and State, in California, prevailing there, suits have been instituted in the proper courts.

Mr. HOAR. By whom?

Mr. EDMUNDS. By private persons, to prevent this nuisance, and it is a prodigious nuisance, for I have seen it myself; and, therefore, so far as the present law stands, it is within the competence of the judicial tribunals having authority over that subject, either State or national, according to the citizenship of the parties, and defending the rights of landholders along the Sacramento River, to enjoin the thing that destroys their land, and the courts in California, whether State or national—I believe the chief case was in the circuit court of the United States—have determined that this sort of thing can not be carried on to the destruction of the fertile lands of the Sacramento, for instance.

Mr. HOAR. But have they determined that they could protect commerce against it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another question. I was only speaking historically, suggesting to my friend from Kansas that under the existing condition of things the owners of property below these great sluice-ways or wash-diggings, or whatever they call them, where the lands were being ruined as they were, have instituted suits, and have succeeded so far as they have gone, and they always will succeed in my opinion in stopping it. Whether that is a reason why Congress should not interfere to protect a navigable river against being filled up is another question, to which I have not addressed myself as yet at all.

Mr. STANFORD. As the Senator from Vermont has stated, those suits were brought by private parties whose rich bottom-lands were being destroyed by the deposits coming down from the mountains. The individual owners of those lands brought suit against the miners, and the circuit court of the United States enjoined the miners from destroying the lands.

Here the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers together, one coming from the south and the other from the north, substantially float two-thirds of the commerce of the State on the water; and I have no doubt this year, from the extraordinary crop likely to be had there, that there will not be less than 700,000 tons of wheat floated on the two rivers this season. The débris that comes in to injure this navigation of the rivers which we want to dredge out, and which this bill makes a small appropriation for, is upon waters peculiarly under the jurisdiction of the United States; each is a tide-water river. The mines that are emptying their débris into the streams that enter into the San Joaquin and Sacramento are on portions of the rivers where the tide rises and falls. The appropriation is for the dredging and improvement of these rivers. It is idle to attempt to dredge them while the miners pour this immense volume of débris into them. If the Government wants to protect its navigable rivers it must stop the débris.

I presume one reason why the appropriation heretofore made has not been used is because it was idle to attempt to dredge those rivers while thousands of tons might go in where one could be taken out. If the Government wants to do anything to these rivers it must stop the cause of the filling, which is this particular kind of mining, and we have limited it. After talking with my colleague and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] I put in a clause to confine it to that character of mining that does the greatest damage. There is a good deal of mining that will do no special harm, and we do not want to disturb it. We confine it to that water which is not merely used through pipes but also through nozzles, as that is the kind of mining that throws this immense quantity of débris into the river. A small appropriation to prevent people from doing the damage is the important point, without which the other money is wasted.

Mr. INGALLS. But I understand that these operations are conducted in a region that is very remote from the navigable part of the streams. Am I not correct?

Mr. STANFORD. Usually.

Mr. INGALLS. Usually. My attention was called, as I said, some time ago to the process on the upper waters of the Feather River, and I think that there were some legal proceedings to test the right of those persons thus engaged in carrying on transactions profitable to themselves by which the rights of others below them upon the stream were injured and in some cases absolutely destroyed.

Mr. STANFORD. The suits were not for the injury done to the streams, but the injury done to the lands adjoining the streams.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course the damage could not be done to the land without the agency of the stream. That is, these great banks of gold-bearing gravel, where the per cent. to the cord was exceedingly small, could not be handled by the ordinary processes with hand labor; and therefore the mountain streams were diverted from their channel and conducted through ducts enormous distances, across ravines, through pipes, and at last directed from nozzles against these banks with such tremendous force that they melted away, and thousands of tons per day were dissolved and washed down, so that, the gold being preserved, the remainder ran into the lowlands below. And not only was the navigation of the stream impeded and its channel filled up, but there was an enormous overflow of this muddy and saturated flood upon the cultivated lands of the riparian proprietors in the lower country, so that its productive capacity was destroyed.

I can readily understand that if these operations were conducted upon the cliffs on the high grounds immediately adjoining these navigable waters, and the débris washed down so that the channel was filled up, we might properly be called upon to arrest the transaction and say that these parties should not be allowed in this way to interfere with the navigation of the stream; but when these transactions are carried on hundreds of miles away, and the whole operation is entirely within the control of the State authorities, and the people themselves are citizens of the State of California, to say that the Government of the United States should be called upon to interfere in a matter of this kind that belongs exclusively to the State seems to me to be carrying the doctrine of centralization rather too far.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. May I ask the Senator a question? The Senator's statement is that if these operations were carried on upon the banks of streams, then Congress could properly interfere in the exercise of its power of protecting commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. Just as we attempted to do in the bill we sought to pass this morning to prevent the discharge of cinders and sewage into the harbors.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Suppose by reason of some similar process 30 miles away, by the melting, as the Senator describes it, of a mountain by hydraulic power or in any other way, the bay of San Francisco for instance was about to be filled up with débris, where is the difference between that case and the case suggested by the Senator? If the power exists in the one case, and if it is the duty of Congress in the one case to prevent the filling up of that great harbor, why not in the other, although the operation my be some distance away?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator does not see the difference where this results from private transactions carried on by citizens of California for their own gain in regions at a great distance from the place where this appropriation is to be employed, of course I can not enlighten him.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It seems to me that it makes no difference what the purpose of the operation may be, whether it is carried on for private gain or for pure deviltry, if the result is the filling up of a navigable river.

Mr. INGALLS. The transaction occurs in a region where the United States has no jurisdiction.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Why not?

Mr. INGALLS. You might as well say that if the stream was injured by reason of some planetary disturbance there would be a right to proceed against the solar system.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I take it that Congress has the power to protect the commerce of the harbor of San Francisco, or has the power to protect the navigation of any of the navigable waters of California, and especially tide-water rivers. It occurs to me that it does not make much difference where the process is used, whether on the bank of the river or 30 miles away. The effect is the same.

Mr. INGALLS. Suppose it occurred in another State?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It does not make a particle of difference. So much the stronger in favor of the power of Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. But if it occurred in a place farther away from the water altogether?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The object of the statute is not to punish anybody particularly, but the text of the bill says "to prevent."

Mr. INGALLS. We are asked to protect the people of California against the rapacity of their own citizens.

Mr. STANFORD. Will the Senator allow me to say that this bill, as I understand, is one relative to matters of national importance. The whole bill is based on that theory. It is in regard to national waters. The entire portion of the river referred to is where the tide flows, and of course within the jurisdiction of the National Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far up does the tide flow?

Mr. STANFORD. It flows above the Feather River, on the Sacramento. That covers all that portion of these two rivers that are injured by the débris.

Mr. INGALLS. What action have the State courts of California taken in regard to this?

Mr. STANFORD. The State courts have held that one man has no right to destroy his neighbor's property.

Mr. INGALLS. He must so use his own as not to injure that of another.

Mr. STANFORD. The circuit court of the United States has held the same thing; but in regard to these navigable waters of the United States the question has not been up, and this appropriation is to affect the waters of the United States, navigable streams, not to protect the farmers. If the United States wants to protect the streams, why not proceed intelligently to stop the very thing that has caused the trouble? I do not suppose that there is any difficulty about the United States doing this and stopping the trouble in the mountains or anywhere else where this débris is put into the rivers. The question is whether or not the Government shall protect the waters of the navigable streams, and it is a very important matter.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the length of the navigable course of these streams below the junction of the Feather and the Sacramento?

Mr. STANFORD. The Feather is about 55 miles north of the Sacramento.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the distance at which these hydraulic operations are carried on above the point at which the river is navigable?

Mr. STANFORD. From 20 to perhaps 70 miles.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the operation complained of in the highlands near the headwaters of the river.

Mr. STANFORD. There is no use clearing streams unless you stop that scouring coming in. No one can appreciate the great amount of gold-bearing earth that comes into the streams unless he sees it.

Mr. DOLPH. This amendment made by the Committee on Commerce was at the instance of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], a member of the Committee. As I understand the Senator from California now, the Senator from Nevada is willing the text of the bill should remain if amended as proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. STANFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLPH. By a subsequent provision in the bill it is made unlawful to do this thing, that is, to carry on hydraulic mining so as to fill up the navigable rivers of the United States or cast or throw anything into the navigable rivers that would obstruct navigation, and it is made the duty of the district attorney to prosecute such offenses. The only addition to this amendment would be to authorize the Secretary of War, this being a special case of great importance, to use a part of the appropriation heretofore made for these rivers, to stop this offense of hydraulic mining. I think it a good amendment, and I hope the amendment of the Senator from California will prevail and that of the committee be rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from California will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1210, in the matter proposed to be stricken out, after the word "mining," it is proposed to insert "by water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure;" so as to read:

If he be not satisfied, he is hereby instructed to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining, by water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure, into either of said rivers or any of its tributaries, or into the San Joaquin River or any of its tributaries, or in or to such place or situation from which such detritus, débris, or slickens may be liable to be washed or carried by storms or floods into either of said rivers or tributaries; and he is hereby instructed to use out of said sum as much as may be necessary for said purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With every disposition to do what Congress properly may for national interests to prevent what is going on out there or has been until stopped by an injunction, I do not see how in the interest of commerce, of keeping the rivers clear, the question is to be determined upon the amount of pressure that is to be brought to bear on a gravel bank that is said to contain gold. It depends upon what is to come down into the river and to impede navigation by shoaling its waters. That is the point. And coming to that point, it would seem that the text of the House bill went to the root of the matter, by stopping the putting into the river these substances put there by this hydraulic mining, which is the only way that these substances that fill up the river and shoal the water get there.

Mr. HEARST. That is the fact; but we want to prevent these things going into the channels, and if we stop hydraulic mining we stop this business. These people have been so industrious that they have made inventions by which they can lift up and wash out a ton of stuff by a force of water 5 miles away for 5 cents. The consequence is that these great inventions have so disarranged things that they have changed the face of nature to some extent. There is one kind of mining that interferes with the streams. We want to be very careful in describing it so as not to interfere with a set of people who occupy a country 400 miles long and 40 miles wide and who produce out of that little belt of country about $20,000,000 annually, which your people in the East need very badly to pay your balances. I want to offer one amendment so as to define what hydraulic mining is. For my own part I do not think the provision ought to be in this bill at all, because the thing has been litigated thoroughly, and every one of the people is under a perpetual injunction from the United States circuit court to-day against doing what is complained of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] will be read for information, but it is not now in order.

Mr. HEARST. I want it read for information. I send it to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 42, in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, after the word "pressure," it is proposed to insert "and against mountain sides or natural banks;" so as to read:

Nor be so construed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining, by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure and against mountain sides or natural banks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, we come back to the original proposition——

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, as I am desired by several Senators to state what course I shall take in regard to the session to-day, I wish to say that I shall request the Senate to remain in session until we can dispose of this bill to-night.

Mr. HEARST. I think my colleague will agree with me. I do not think that my colleague or anybody from any part of the world has any objection to any kind of mining in California except hydraulic mining, and I have endeavored to get the bill framed both in committee and here so as to stop that. I think that two-thirds of all the people in California are willing to do that. Of course it is a hardship, because we stop the investment of millions of dollars by doing that; but we ought not to go further. I have my pocket full of letters and telegrams coming every day expressing fears that by this action the whole mining industry in the Sierra Nevada will be destroyed.

Mr. STANFORD. To the amendment of my colleague I have no objection, as it confines it more particularly to this peculiar kind of mining which is doing the great damage. The ordinary mining does not do so much damage as that the people need have any apprehension about it, and I do not believe the Government would find it necessary to interfere with that kind of mining.

This hydraulic mining is confined to a few large companies, and probably there are not above three thousand miners engaged in that kind of mining. I do not use that as an argument, but only give it as a statement of fact. Almost all these companies are largely composed of non-resident owners; and if the miners were thrown out of employment, as they are a first-class set of men, they probably would be engaged in other industrial pursuits in less than thirty days.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there any way by which the débris that results from the hydraulic mining can be impounded and arrested, so as not to corrupt the courses of the streams?

Mr. STANFORD. I can safely say that it is universally supposed to be impossible.

Mr. INGALLS. Therefore, if this provision here shall prevail the operation of mining by the hydraulic process must stop.

Mr. STANFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. In a region of country, as the Senator's colleague states, of 400 miles in length by 35 to 40 in width, and there $20,000,000 per year are extracted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Kansas will permit me to make a statement in regard to this, and perhaps in reference to the term "hydraulic mining." As stated by the Senator from Oregon, this amendment in the Senate was made to conform to the views of the situation entertained by the Senator from Nevada, as he was familiar with the state of affairs in California. As the clause came from the House you will observe the words in line 1206 "hurtful to navigation" were not inserted. We inserted these words to exclude a certain kind of hydraulic mining.

Mr. INGALLS. May I speak one word there?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from California who is nearest me [Mr. STANFORD] states in reply to my interrogatory that there is no way of arresting or impounding the débris if the hydraulic mining process is carried on, so that it must necessarily run into the channels of the streams if the process that is now going on be continued. Therefore, if this is to prevail, if the Senator from California is right, the process of mining by the hydraulic system is at an end.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The term "hydraulic mining," as I understand it from information received from the Senator from Nevada, includes different processes, one of which is by water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure. That kind of hydraulic mining I suppose is the kind referred to by the Senator from California who is before me. But there is a kind of hydraulic mining which is followed by persons of smaller holdings there, which does not interfere with the navigation of the streams at all, and yet which would be included under the term "hydraulic mining" in the clause as it came from the House.

Mr. INGALLS. But I understand this mining by the hydraulic process has a technical signification; that in these vast deposits of gravel the per cent. of gold is so small that it could not be extracted by the ordinary processes, that it requires extraordinary capital to construct these sluice-ways from distant mountain sources so that the streams are directed through nozzles and poured with immense force. I am told sometimes a stream goes with such velocity that you can not chop it with an ax when it comes from the nozzle that is directed against these banks of gravel, and they dissolve away and disappear absolutely before the tremendous force of the stream. That of course necessarily, if the statement of the Senator from California is true, we are interfering with, and not only interfering with, but destroying a process that results in the extraction of $20,000,000 per annum which would otherwise be entirely lost.

Mr. STANFORD. But a small proportion of the gold is taken out by hydraulic mining. The quartz mining is now the most important of all; but there are thousands of people engaged in small mining, washing through sluices and washing down the banks with a little water. Those we do not desire to interfere with. I think our streams can get along very well without interfering with this class of miners; but we can not protect the rivers and allow that peculiar kind of mining which is so very well understood by the name of "hydraulic mining;" in other words, through pipes and nozzles, because that defines exactly the kind of mining we desire to prohibit. Any kind of mining by water is, in one sense, hydraulic mining,

Mr. INGALLS. But "hydraulic mining" does not mean that. It does not mean taking dirt in a pan and shaking it out by water and collecting the gold at the bottom of the pan. That is not "hydraulic mining."

Mr. STANFORD. Directing the water through pipes is what is understood as "hydraulic mining."

Mr. EDMUNDS. As far as the United States are concerned the question would seem to be to prevent, if we are to go on with this business in this bill—which, like a good many parts of it, has nothing to do with the question—the obstruction of navigable waters of the United States. The question is not so much how they are obstructed, but the fact that they are obstructed by bringing into them substances that shoal their waters, whether produced by what you call hydraulic mining or quartz mining or sluice mining or pan mining or any kind of mining.

The point is that if the débris of this business comes into a navigable river you want to stop it. I do not say you want to stop it on this bill, which has so many other devices in it for doing things that do not belong to it properly; but if you are to have it at all, the question is not as to the amount, but as to the result. I think therefore that the bill as it came from the House, which is limited a little too much even in that point of view, states in general the case that you have got a river in the State of California, or rivers in it, into which the operations by citizens of that State on their own lands discharge gravel and soil and mud; but the point is not how it got in there, but the fact that it is there. Therefore if you are to do anything at all, you are to say that it shall not be allowed to go there, without reference to the means by which your river is filled up, and we are called on from year to year to dig it out again.

What difference does it make any more than it would to say as private citizens, if our neighbor was discharging his water or his sluice upon our land, whether he did it by one means or another means, by a method of one name or another name, so that he violates our rights of property by bringing upon us a thing that he has no right to bring, we do not care what the method is, it is the result; and it is just so here. If these rivers are the rivers of the United States, which the United States has the right and the duty to protect for navigation, then we do not depend upon the question whether it is done by hydraulic mining of one name or another name or any other kind of mining. We go to the fact that the operations of men upon their own property bring into these rivers a sediment and a deposit that impedes navigation. That is the point.

Now, what kind of a river is the Sacramento River, and what kind of authority have the United States over it? The Sacramento River is just like the Hudson, which I know very well, as it is on my way home; it is wholly within the limits of one State. Every authority of that State can be exerted over it. A homicide committed in the middle of it, or an assault, or a conflict, or any other of the operations of violation of rights in the public sense is within the jurisdiction of the State of New York. So it is in respect of the Sacramento River in the State of California, leaving out of view in both cases the simple maritime jurisdiction of the United States, which is not a jurisdiction over the body of the river and its adjacents and belongings, but only a jurisdiction over the operations of men who are seafaring men as they may be called. That is all there is of maritime jurisdiction where the tide ebbs and flows.

Now, we have the Sacramento River, like the Hudson, and here up at Troy are people engaged in great iron-works, and they dump into the Hudson River every day from their great iron-works the slag, &c. On what ground is it that Congress would undertake to interfere with that? It has none; perhaps it ought to do so if it has the power. Where does it get the right? Has the Congress of the United States under the Constitution the right to enter every State and say that no land-owner along the borders of a stream that Congress chooses to improve, or to appropriate money for the improvement of, or to be expended upon, whether improved or not, shall govern his own individual conduct of his own property in respect to that water? I doubt it. Congress has jurisdiction to regulate commerce "among the several States," and not in them. That is the language of the Constitution.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. This is a very important subject. Suppose we have the power asserted in the lines proposed to be stricken out, why should we not have the right to go into mountains above any navigable stream and beyond the navigable part of that stream and prevent the cutting down of the timber, which is believed by many to produce floods which overflow the whole country and destroy navigation? Why should we not have the same power to prevent private owners from cutting down that timber that we would have to prevent these people from carrying on their mining operations beyond the navigation of the river?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Texas has stated what I was about to say so much better than I could, as one point of illustration, that I need not repeat it. I will take another illustration. We had a day or two ago from the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] a most interesting description of the great national importance of the Bayou Terre Bonne in Louisiana, which the engineer's report showed to be wholly within the State of Louisiana, and to be at this time of the year a mere ditch, but a stream, a bayou, a place—that is the best definition, "a place"—on the surface of the earth to which Congress has devoted public money for digging it out and making more water in it in respect to the depth than there was before. Now, suppose Congress, instead of the police jury that my friend from Louisiana (whom I do not see in his seat at this moment) said controlled it, had passed an act declaring that none of the planters along the Bayou Terre Bonne should open any ditch that entered into that bayou, does anybody maintain for a moment that it would not have been an absolutely null and void declaration of Congress?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, with pleasure. I am seeking for information.

Mr. HALE. Does not this bill, later on than the part which we are now considering, propose to do in clear and explicit terms precisely what the Senator is deprecating? I find in section 2 that the bill takes jurisdiction of an entire stream, if I interpret it aright. Let me read this and ask the Senator what his interpretation of section 2 is on this very point. It provides that:

> It shall not be lawful to cast, throw, empty, or unlade, or cause, suffer, or procure to be cast, thrown, emptied, or unladen, either from or out of any ship, vessel, lighter, barge, boat, or other craft, or from the shore, pier, wharf, or mills of any kind whatever, any ballast, stone, slate, gravel, earth, slack, rubbish, wreck, filth, slabs, edgings, sawdust, slag, or cinders, or other refuse or mill-waste of any kind, into any port, road, roadstead, harbor, haven, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, for the improvement of which Congress has already made, or may hereafter make, appropriations, or to dump, discharge, or wash, or cause to be dumped, discharged, or washed, from any mine or mineral land or bank, tailings, bowlders, gravel, clay, earth, or débris into any navigable waters or rivers for the improvement of which Congress has made or may make appropriations, or into any tributaries, branch, or affluent of such waters or rivers.

Now, can anything be more clear and explicit in its purpose than this provision of the bill that the Senate is now considering, to take the charge and control throughout the entire extent of a river to its farthest source, covering a jurisdiction which I understand the Senator is opposed to? If that is so, I wish the Senator, before he gets through, would address himself to this very clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have not got to that clause yet, but as the Senator from Maine says it touches the same topic, and as he says the United States may, on the theory of these entirely intrastate rivers and above the ebb and flow of the tide—though I do not think that makes any legal difference, but I will assume that it does for the purpose of the argument—take the entire jurisdiction and domination, the sovereign power over what shall be done in, and of, and about such a river, just as a State might, the State of Vermont, or the State of Texas, or Georgia, or Maine, in respect of a public highway that had been created by State authority, and say, "you shall not throw your ashes out on that highway," which a State may lawfully and properly do; "you may not do anything in that highway except to pass over it; nothing shall stand upon it; nothing shall go upon it; nothing shall lie upon it," except what the State authority chooses to say. And so coming to the great State of North Carolina, which is rich in appropriations for improvements, as they are called, but rather scant of water away from the seaboard.

I remember an instance a few years ago of one of these very same navigable national highways, national streams, where we were asked to make an appropriation for its further improvement, and turning to the report of the Chief of Engineers, it appeared that in order to make the improvement at all available for purposes of commerce it was necessary to build an extensive pumping establishment on one stream and pump the water over into the stream that was to be improved.

Now on this theory, whether Congress had appropriated or not—because the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress does not depend upon whether it has spent any money; it stands upon a fundamental principle—Congress would have the authority to say that nobody should do anything about the French Broad, if that was the name of the stream, that Congress had not previously authorized might be done; that the land-owner should not wash his sheep in it, that he should not let his timber fall into it, that he should not catch trout in it, or do whatever else he wanted to do, although he owned the land on both sides.

That sort of thing will not stand; and it shows the utter absurdity of failing to distinguish between what the Constitution has given us the authority to do in the regulation of commerce among the several States, to provide for great national highways, whether of water, or of road, or of railway from State to State and great national ports for foreign commerce; and this business of going into every place where there is a dew—I state it extremely of course—any little river that may be made locally advantageous as a private canal would be, or a sluiceway, and undertake to say that that is a subject for national improvement, and, being a subject for national improvement, is within the jurisdiction of Congress to dominate everything there is about it, because one thing follows from the other——

Mr. HALE. I say that it goes a great way further, and in the same section from which I have read it does not confine this jurisdiction. This provision not only prohibits the dumping of earth or refuse of any kind into a river or on its banks, but forbids it upon lands in any place or situation on the shore where the same shall be liable to be washed into any navigable waters either by ordinary high tides, or by storms, or floods, or otherwise. When that section is reached, if not before, I should be very glad if the Senator in charge of this bill would explain to the Senate upon what theory the committee has departed from what has been I believe usually understood as the limit of jurisdiction of the United States. It is the section in which the Committee on Commerce amplified the jurisdiction of the United States beyond all points appropriated for and take possession of the rivers entirely to their source, the streams and the tributaries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a House section.

Mr. HALE. It is a House section, but it is not struck out by the committee. The committee report it in full. They go beyond taking jurisdiction of the mere subjects of appropriation, and beyond the river or the stream, and include the entire tributaries; and then beyond that declare as a matter of law, with penalties affixed, that a citizen of the United States who deposits anything upon his own land, away from the shore, at any place where it is liable to be washed by tide, or flood, or storm into any river, or tributary of any river, upon which there has been or any part of it an appropriation, shall be subject to pains and penalties. If that is not a most enormous stretch of jurisdiction beyond what has ever been claimed before, then I am entirely unfamiliar, as I acknowledge myself to be to a great degree, with the legislation on this subject. I should like to have that thoroughly explained and elucidated to the Senate when we reach it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The broad distinction is as to the power of the United States to appropriate money to any object that it deems to be for the public welfare. We gave it many years ago—I say "we," I mean the nation—to the sufferers from an earthquake at New Madrid, in Missouri, which led to a great deal of litigation, a great deal of legislation, and a great many claims. We have given it to sufferers of all kinds, from floods and storms and the unfortunate political convulsions in other countries. In other words, we have exercised in every direction what I believe to be a competent constitutional power to appropriate the money of the tax-payers to any purpose that Congress deems to be for the general welfare.

That is one thing, and therefore I can not doubt that the appropriations contained in this bill for making the smallest stream over which Congress, in any other sense than that of making a donation to it, has no more jurisdiction than I have, is perfectly constitutional. If we want to make a charity of that kind, very good; I think the Constitution warrants us in giving away the money of the United States as long as we please.

Mr. STANFORD. Allow me to ask a question. This appropriation the district attorney of the United States may use for the purpose of preventing the dumping of this débris to the destruction of the stream? That is the point we are after.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not on the question of giving money.

Mr. HEARST. I wish to ask my colleague if that money can not be used to disturb our people to a frightful extent and induce a very unnecessary agitation? That is my opinion.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. I desire for my own information to understand his line of argument. I ask the Senator from Vermont, conceding as we all do the power of Congress to put an improvement in aid of navigation in any port or harbor open to the high seas and foreign commerce, if Congress has not the power to provide that that improvement shall not be interfered with or removed, and if so from whence the power comes, and if there is any difference between that power and the power to protect an improvement elsewhere?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difference, if I may say it, with great humiliation and respect to my friend from Florida, is the difference between private right and public right. I will take the entrance to the harbor of New York, if you please, for an illustration. I might take San Francisco, or perhaps the mouth of the Saint John's River, or Tampa Bay.

At the entrance of the harbor of New York, below high-water mark, or to make it safe I will say below low-water mark of the tide, there is no private ownership of property; and when Congress provides for clearing off the bar at the entrance of New York Harbor it does it under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations. I do not know any other authority except the authority merely to give money; but when it undertakes to exert force, which is different from giving money, and tells its engineers "You shall do that thing," and they undertake to do it, and any other power undertakes to stop them, then it becomes a question of the force of conflicting rights, and there is nobody to stand in the way there except the sovereign power of the State of New York.

That sovereign power of the State of New York is confined to subjects that do not interfere with the regulation of commerce between the United States and foreign nations.

I am speaking now of that particular case which I take for an illustration. If, therefore, the act of Congress directs the engineers to dig out the bar at the harbor of New York to the depth of 30 feet, and they begin to dig, and the private land-owner on either side undertakes to interfere, the answer to him is easy enough, "You have no interest in this question at all; you do not own the land where we are digging." That is the end of him. Then when the State of New York comes and undertakes to interfere, the answer is that "Although you have a perfect sovereign municipal jurisdiction, this being within the borders of a county, we are now exerting the power of regulating commerce with a foreign nation, and are providing where the tide ebbs and flows, the public waters of the world coming into your harbor, and interfering with no private ownership, we are enabling commerce to come in." Very good. That is the answer to that question.

When you go to the top of the Winooski River, in the State of Vermont—which I am bound to say from having seen them both is much larger and surrounded by a much more populous country and a more fertile region than, I was going to say, fifty places that can be named in this bill—if Congress undertakes to send its engineer to dig out the sand-bars and the rock-bars in the Winooski River and they were met by the land-owner, the law would be that the land-owners on each side—and the farms often cross it on both sides—owned the bottom of that river, and the engineer would be up if the land-owner resisted; of course he would not resist, because it is a jolly thing for him to sell his chickens and his eggs and his wheelbarrows and things to the engineers and their workmen who proceed to dig. As Blackstone says—my friend is so familiar at least with the comic one—infra dig, which means dig the bottom of every rivulet and brook which you can get so long as Congress will provide the money to do it.

Mr. CALL. Now I will ask the Senator, if he will allow me, with greater humiliation than he had, suppose we enter into the New York Harbor by virtue of the power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce and make an improvement because there is no private property there, is there any reason why we should not go up to the head of the river, to the iron-works that he speaks of where they dump the iron slag into the river, and there being no private property there, Congress should interfere and prevent them putting the slag in? Simply because there is a right of private property somewhere, this national power to protect the works it may create is divested. Is that the idea?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends on another branch of the law, with which my friend is so familiar, of remote and proximate forces. If the United States, having perfect authority to dredge out the bar at the entrance to the harbor at New York, could prove to a jury of twelve honest men, under proper directions from the presiding judge, that the man who at the top of the Hudson River had dumped in his slag had necessarily and as a direct cause, not a remote one, brought those slags to that bar, I agree that Congress could prohibit it.

Mr. CALL. The Senator admits the power of Congress to do it then within a State?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No. I admit the power of Congress to protect a public work that it has a right of its own authority to do, as distinguished from making a donation of money to do it. That is the difference.

Mr. STANFORD. Now, that I may not misunderstand the Senator, let me say that this is a case in which the harbor of San Francisco, one of the most important of the country, is threatened. It is only a question of time if the mountains are allowed to be washed down the valleys when the harbor of San Francisco itself will be destroyed. Now, do I understand the Senator from Vermont to say that there shall be nothing done, that Congress has no power to stop this washing down of débris into these streams so as to destroy that harbor?

All that we are asking under this bill is that Congress may authorize the United States district attorney, out of the money already appropriated, to use so much as he may think necessary in order to stop the filling up and the destruction of those two rivers and this harbor of San Francisco. If I understand the Senator correctly in regard to what might go on at the head of the Hudson River affecting the harbor of New York, the power is in this bill to make the appropriation necessary to prevent it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much has the harbor of San Francisco shoaled from these washings so far?

Mr. STANFORD. Very largely. An engineer tells me it is very important that a new survey should be made of the harbor of San Francisco. Suisun Bay, which is a portion of the harbor of San Francisco itself, where ships of any tonnage might pass a few years ago, is now so filed up that tules are growing up in the center of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Gold-bearing sand?

Mr. STANFORD. It comes down washed from the mountains.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that the question which is raised by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maine is nothing, when you come to look at it for a moment, but the old question of the right to make these improvements, these public works, within the body of a State. I suppose there are but few members in this or the other House left, there are very few of the antediluvians or fossils left, who entertain the old doctrine that our predecessors had to encounter down to the time of James Monroe. We have the right, not merely under the power to provide for the general welfare, but under our power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, to provide for the construction of public ways whether by land or by water, which ways are important tributaries or contribute to such commerce.

Mr. Webster put as his illustration of the power of Congress the case of a canal beginning in South Carolina and ending in South Carolina, and he declared in his seat here that if it were proposed to him to appropriate money to build a canal beginning and ending in South Carolina, which was important to commerce among the States as a part of its roadway and he were to refuse, he would not dare go home and face his constituents.

If we have a right, as we have shown by building railroads and as we have shown by contributing to the building of canals, and as we have shown by clearing out harbors on the ocean, to do this thing, we have a right to protect these public ways in the process of construction or after they are constructed, and we have a right to enact that a man who washes away by raising a dam against it the embankment of a railway which Congress has built or helped to build, we have a right to enact that that shall not be done, and to protect the structure by civil restraint, by injunction, or by provision for criminal process.

Mr. HEARST. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HEARST. All of what the Senator says about a canal or anything that the Government has artificially made——

Mr. HOAR. I am coming to the question of the river that the Government did not make.

Mr. HEARST. But these people ought to be allowed to control a country 400 or 500 miles long not on the stream.

Mr. HOAR. That is another matter. I am trying to state the answer to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont.

It is settled that these State rivers flowing into other rivers, or flowing into the sea, or existing anywhere where the commerce that passes over them may go abroad or may go to another State, are within the national jurisdiction. Originally in England the admiralty jurisdiction was held to be over those places only where the tide ebbed and flowed, and our courts adopted in the beginning that limit of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction of the constitutional clause, but the Supreme Court held about fifteen or twenty years ago that that was not a definition as being an equivalent in reason or meaning, but it was only an accidental coincidence.

It happened that there being no large rivers in England, the limit of international commerce happened to coincide with the limit of the ebb and flow of the tide, and therefore when you applied it to our vast streams, our vast lakes, the true limit was to be found by applying the national power to all commerce which might pass from one State to another, whether by river or by lake or by artificial ways. So a river in the State of Vermont, or Massachusetts, or Alabama, which is or which may be made a means of transporting commerce on its way from one State to another, on its way from the cotton plantation in South Carolina or Alabama either to Liverpool by sea or to Boston by inland ways, is within the national jurisdiction.

Now, if we are to have a right to construct a canal wholly artificial and to declare that the person who fills up that canal as we are constructing it or after we have constructed it is interfering with international or interstate commerce and may be prevented by criminal or civil processes, we have a right to take a river which is half or two-thirds or nine-tenths or ninety-nine one hundredths ready to make into a canal, and we have a right to provide for dredging it out and to protect it when we have dredged it out by a precisely similar enactment, which is what this proposition of my honorable friend from California and the section which he proposes to amend undertook to do.

I go further, and I say if you have got a natural stream fitted to be an instrument of such commerce without any work or expenditure upon it by the United States Government except the simple protection of it, and it be a tributary of international commerce now there prepared and ready as it came from the hand of the Almighty, just as the lake is, just as the Mississippi River for a great part of its course is, just as the Hudson River through a great part of its course is, you have the same right to interpose for the regulation or protection of commerce by preventing the obstruction of that canal. There is no difference in principle; or if there be a difference in principle, the difference is in favor of the simpler and more direct process.

So that if you may make a ditch on land and fill it with water and protect it by an enactment of this class, you may dig out a canal half made in the shoals of a river and protect that. If you may do either of those things, a fortiori you may regulate and protect commerce by saying that the great water ways already existing and perfect shall be protected and maintained in their perfection as they exist and shall not be interfered with, and it is one function, one constitutional power, one beneficent, humane duty that Congress is performing in all three of the cases.

Now, as I understand the proposition of the honorable Senator from California, it does not undertake to say that a certain business shall stop in the California mountains because the result of that business has been to destroy the streams, but it says that when that business is operating to cause the destruction of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin and the Feather Rivers, then the authority of the United States may be invoked to prevent that destruction and that injury. That is all. I see, therefore, no difficulty in finding constitutional power to accomplish this thing.

I wish before I sit down to make, however, one observation called out by an observation of the Senator from Vermont, and which we hear in almost every speech in opposition either to this bill in general or to any of its provisions, the suggestion that this river and harbor bill and its predecessors contain any considerable number to speak of of these little trifling provisions. I do not believe this bill for the last ten years has contained a provision, unless it has escaped the careful scrutiny of the committee, which was not for an object which in some way was important to the international or interstate commerce of the country. It is almost unusual.

President Arthur undertook to veto the river and harbor bill four years ago this summer. The whole press of the country went off into a tirade on this subject, which I heard the very foremost scientific man of America, a name which if I were at liberty to cite it would command respect from every Senator in this Chamber, say was half craze and half plot, and the next year that Executive was challenged by the House of Representatives to point out and enumerate the items in the bill which he thought were not required by the needs of national commerce, and the Secretary of War made answer, which he said had been submitted to the Executive himself, saying that there was but 5 per cent. of the entire $18,000,000 which that year's scrutiny enabled that Secretary of War to point out. I went over that bill and studied it carefully, and I affirm my individual opinion that there was hardly one item in the whole number in regard to which the opposition of the then Executive could have been maintained.

The two items selected in the State of Massachusetts were Plymouth Harbor and Wareham River. Plymouth Harbor is the second importing point in Massachusetts, where they have the large rope-walks—the second importing point in number of its imports in Massachusetts, and Plymouth Harbor had been put in that bill in consequence of a special executive message. There had come into the Senate before the river and harbor bill was reported a communication from the Secretary of War forwarding the reports of the engineers, in which he said that one of the two arms of sand that make Plymouth Harbor had been washed away in a great freshet, and there was danger unless a breakwater could be at once completed that that whole sand-spit would be washed into the harbor and the trade of the town and its commerce ruined, and urging upon Congress a special appropriation out of time to protect that important harbor. My friend the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] called my attention to it when it was referred to his committee.

I had never heard of it before, and I went around and got the consent of every member of the Committee on Commerce except one to introduce and pass through the Senate a special bill for that purpose. I proposed the bill in the Senate, and the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], whom I had not happened to see, rose and said that while he would not press his objection if I insisted, yet he thought it would be so dangerous a precedent to have any of these schemes separated from the rest before they had been fully examined by the committee at their meetings; and as it was the warm season of the year, when no new storm was likely to occur, he hoped I would not press the bill further, and I let it go, and it was put into the general river and harbor bill. That was one of the things put in at executive importunity which was suggested in that veto as a thing not belonging to national commerce.

The other was Wareham River, a river which supplies with coal and iron and lime and brick a great manufacturing town larger than the capitals of some States of this country and more important. That was the only other objection.

Now, sir, I wish to say that the people of the country ought to understand and the Senate ought to remember that under the construction put upon this matter by President Grant no President of the United States is bound to expend the sums herein appropriated within the fiscal year, or, indeed, at any time. If there goes to the Executive a river and harbor bill containing a single item which he discovers is not important, in regard to which he thinks Congress has been misled or mistaken, he is at perfect liberty to refrain from making that expenditure, and can send in a message and ask Congress to reconsider the subject.

Mr. KENNA. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. KENNA. The Senator is correct in his statement that President Grant started out on that theory; but on investigation and inquiry he abandoned it and spent every dollar appropriated.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think he abandoned the theory. I have not heard the theory questioned since President Grant's day.

Mr. KENNA. In fact I happen to know that the matter was brought to his attention by a number of gentlemen, among whom was General Butler, then a member of the other House, and on examination of the question President Grant concluded that he had no more right to suspend the expenditure of an appropriation for specific purposes by that bill than by any other bill.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator observed how I limited my statement. My statement is that the President is not bound to expend it within that year. It is not a year bill at all, and therefore, if he discovers that Congress has been mistaken, or that any particular item is not of national importance, he is at perfect liberty to delay that expenditure and to ask Congress to reconsider it by sending in a message the next year.

Mr. KENNA. I did not desire to antagonize the Senator's view at all; I hope it is exactly correct.

Mr. HOAR. That is the way I understand it.

Now, Mr. President, the commerce of this country is made up of the contributions of the individual parts of the country, and you might just as well hold up the post-office in some frontier village as a matter for sneer or condemnation or contempt. It may not be of national importance that the people of the town of Paxton should have a post-office, looking at that alone, but it is of national importance that every citizen of the United States, if it be possible, should have the facilities of a post-office, and you must take the aggregate and not the individual item when you are looking at the question.

There may be a very few cases, very rare cases indeed, where appropriations are excessive, because these bills do not appropriate a tenth part of what we might properly and profitably appropriate in a single year. They do not appropriate in proportion to the demands and exigencies of this great country a tenth part of what either England or France appropriates. England has a coast line of, I think, about 1,300 miles. We have over 23,000 miles without Alaska. England appropriates from her national treasury to these great works through her great boards ten times annually, I suppose, what we appropriate. I have not looked at the figures within a few days, but in proportion it is enormously for her 1,300 miles in excess of what we appropriate for our 23,000 miles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it is all for great harbors.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, it is all for great harbors, and it is that policy which has made them great. The Clyde was a little stream over which you could toss a biscuit and up which a boy could wade, and the Mersey was not much better. It was because England made these appropriations at the time of the small things of these little harbors that she is the great commercial mistress of the world to-day.

It may not be important that a single little harbor in Michigan, or a single reach of the sea on the coast of Massachusetts, or a single creek which takes off the cotton from certain plantations in Louisiana, taken alone by itself, should be developed, but it is important that every one of these things the country over should have its reasonable and proper and fitting access to the great commercial system of the nation and the great commercial system of all mankind; and it is from that policy, and from that policy alone, that has grown our vast internal commerce, and that will grow, if it be pursued with courage, liberality, and good sense, our commercial supremacy which we are yet to have among the nations of the earth in both hemispheres.

Mr. President, there is not a statesman of the past whose reputation has been worth surviving the falling of the clods of earth on his coffin-lid who has not been pledged to this river and harbor policy which is treated with these little sneers in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will let us adjourn now. It is quite impossible to finish the bill to-night.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to make a little statement.

Mr. HAWLEY. Was not my motion received?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not. The Senator from Oregon had been recognized before the Senator from Connecticut rose.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will not the Senator from Oregon kindly yield and let the Senate adjourn? He will have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. DOLPH. I am willing to yield to the motion if I retain the floor in case the motion is voted down.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly. I renew the motion.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator is about to make the motion, I desire to ask the Senate to come to some understanding about the disposition of this bill before the motion to adjourn is put.

Mr. INGALLS. We can dispose of it to-morrow before we adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If I can obtain unanimous consent to dispose of the bill to-morrow——

Mr. INGALLS. We can not fix an hour.

Mr. KENNA. Take the day; we can finish it during the day.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think if the Senate would fix an hour to-morrow it would be better.

Mr. HEARST. We want to have the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] here.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to agree that the bill shall be finished to-morrow. ["Agreed."]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that this bill shall be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean by that a motion to adjourn shall not be in order to-morrow? If so, I object. I will stick by the Senator to-night and to-morrow and all the time; I shall not adjourn until he says so; but I do not propose to tie up the hands of the Senate against adjourning to-morrow if it desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think it is understood that we can dispose of the bill to-morrow. Is there unanimous consent to that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is objected to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I did not so understand. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that he would not move to adjourn to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to that in that form. I will stay with the Senator to-night and to-morrow, if I am living, and will stay until the bill is out of the way; but I will not consent that the Senate shall agree by unanimous consent that a motion to adjourn to-morrow shall not be in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I ask unanimous consent, with the exception stated by the Senator from Vermont, that the bill shall be disposed of to-morrow before adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that. Go as fast as you can, subject to any motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that this bill may be disposed of to-morrow if there is no adjournment before it is disposed of. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all you can do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock p. m.), the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 13, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 12, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BULLOCK.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ASHEVILLE, N. C.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 5546, entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C."

If the needs of the Government are alone considered, the proposed building is only necessary for the accomodation of two terms of the United States court in each year and to provide an office for the clerk of that court and more commodious quarters for the post-office.

The terms of the court are now held in the county court-room at Asheville at an expense to the Government of $50 for each term; the clerk of the court occupies a room for which an annual rent of $150 is paid, and the rent paid for the rooms occupied by the post-office is $180 each year.

The postmaster reports that four employés are regularly engaged in his office, which is now rated as third class.

I have no doubt that the court could be much more conveniently provided for in a new building if one should be erected; but it is represented to me that the regular terms held at Asheville last only two or three weeks each, though special terms are ordered at times to clear the docket. It is difficult to see from any facts presented in support of this bill why the United States court does not find accommodations which fairly answer its needs in the rooms now occupied by it. The floor-space furnished for the terms of the Federal court is stated to be 75 by 100 feet, which, it must be admitted, provides a very respectable court-room.

It is submitted that the necessity to the Government of a proper place to hold its courts is the only consideration which should have any weight in determining upon the propriety of expending the money which will be necessary to erect the proposed new building.

The limit of its cost is fixed in the bill under consideration at the sum of $80,000; but the history of such projects justifies the expectation that this limit will certainly be exceeded.

I am satisfied that the present necessity for this building is not urgent, and that something may be gained by a delay which will demonstrate more fully the public needs, and thus better suggest the style and size of the building to be erected.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 10, 1886.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that this message, with the accompanying bill, lie over for the present.

Mr. STORM. I do not see what is the object of that. Why not refer the matter to the appropriate committee? I shall have to insist on its taking the usual course.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman will not object to my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House for immediate action, unless some motion is made in regard to it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the bill, with the accompanying veto message, be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

JEAN LOUIS LEGARÉ.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a communication from Sir Lionel West relative to the bill (H. R. 4553) to compensate Jean Louis Legaré for services and expenses in procuring the surrender of Sitting Bull; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

HEATING APPARATUS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect recommending appropriations for the purchase of heating apparatus in certain public buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INSPECTION OF STEAM VESSELS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing letters from the local inspector of steam-vessels, New York city, and recommending the early passage of the bill (S. 2719) to amend the laws relating to the inspection of steam vessels.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the communication be referred to the Select Committee on Ship-building.

Mr. REAGAN. I would not object to the reference but that this is a measure which properly goes to the Committee on Commerce, and also because this select committee has managed in some way or other, in disregard of the objects of its own creation, to take about all the business from the Committee on Commerce. I therefore object to that reference.

Mr. DINGLEY. This matter has been reported by the committee, the original bill was prepared in the committee, and this is simply a part of the same subject.

Mr. REAGAN. We have the same bills before the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, in view of the fact that this relates to the inspection of steam vessels generally, that it would apply to all steam vessels, whether ocean-going or coastwise, and hence it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DINGLEY. But, Mr. Speaker, this relates entirely to a matter before the Shipping Committee, where the President recommended a certain amendment and where the bill has been reported in accordance with that amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. A reference to the resolution creating that committee shows it does not embrace that subject at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move its reference to that committee.

Mr. REAGAN. If necessary I will offer an amendment, that it go to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be unnecessary, since, judging from the title of the bill, not having examined its text, the Chair is of the impression that it will go there anyhow if the House refuses the reference to the select committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is a bill which I draughted myself, which was referred originally to that committee, and has been considered by it and reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 45.

So the motion of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to.

REFERENCE OF A SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 2217) for the relief of Andrew T. McReynolds; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to move to dispense with the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. This day is set apart under the rule for the call of the States and Territories.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to suspend that order?

The SPEAKER. There is no provision in the rule for such motion, and the Chair has never known it to be done except by unanimous consent. The Chair presumes, however, there will not be many bills offered at this stage of the session.

LOAN OF TENTS.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 181) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Southwestern Iowa and Northwestern Missouri Veteran Soldiers' Association for reunion purposes and put the same upon its passage. This is a resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for reunion purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let it be read first.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to its being read for information.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to loan to the Southwestern Iowa and Northwestern Missouri Veteran Soldiers' Association a sufficient number of tents, poles, and pins as may be needed for the purposes of the annual reunion of said association for the year 1886: Provided, That before delivering said property the Secretary of War shall take from the officers of said association a bond, to be approved by him, in such amount and so conditioned as to secure the speedy return of said property uninjured and without expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The committee recommend the following amendments:

In line 6, after the word "pins," insert "that have been used or condemned."

Also add the following as section 2:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to loan to the Tri-State Veterans' Association of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan tents that have been used or condemned, in sufficient number to cover twenty thousand troops, for use at a reunion to be held at Fort Wayne, Ind., on the 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23d of August next: Provided, That before delivering said property the Secretary of War shall take from the officers of said association a bond, to be approved by him, in such amount and so conditioned as to secure the speedy return of said property uninjured, and without expense to the United States."

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to offer a further amendment to the amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs, if in order.

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to loan to the Northwestern Missouri Veteran Soldiers' Association a sufficient number of tents, poles, and pins that have been used or condemned as may be needed for the purposes of the annual reunion of said association for the year 1886: Provided, That before delivering said property the Secretary of War shall take from the officers of said association a bond, to be approved by him, in such amount and so conditioned as to secure the speedy return of said property uninjured and without expense to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Is a further amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I am informed by the gentleman who offered the original resolution that he does not wish this amendment mixed up with it, and I will withdraw it, therefore, and have it referred to the committee.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being so engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOWRY. I move that the title be amended to conform to the amendments.

The title was amended accordingly.

Mr. HEPBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions for reference to the appropriate committees.

Mr. MCRAE. This bill involves a question of law. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The bill provides for the appointment of a commission. The Chair does not see that it involves any question of law, but the gentleman from Arkansas moves to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let the title be again read.

The title was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would seem to belong to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the second Monday of the month, set apart for the consideration of matters coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia——

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the House will see it is of the highest importance the legislative, &c., appropriation bill should be disposed of and become a law as soon as possible. Therefore I hope the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] having charge of the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia will agree to postpone the consideration of that business, so the House can take up and dispose of the amendments of the Senate to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Indiana when the fifteen days will expire?

Mr. HOLMAN. On the 15th of this month. I therefore move, if my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] having charge of the District business does not object, that it be postponed until after the consideration of the business set apart for to-morrow, and that to-day be devoted to disposing of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. ROWELL. If that be agreed to, does it terminate with to-morrow?

Mr. HOLMAN. No.

Mr. ROWELL. The other business may take up the whole session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that is hardly possible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the request. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent to postpone the consideration of the business of the District of Columbia, taking to-day for the consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, and to take up the District business for one day immediately after disposing of the business set apart for to-morrow.

Mr. POWELL. Why can not you give us to-day?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Individually I will consent provided a day is fixed beyond which the business set apart for to-morrow shall not extend. I think we might say not later than Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman accept?

Mr. COBB. What business is alluded to when gentlemen speak of the business set apart by the House for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Certain classes of bills reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, which by resolution adopted on Saturday were set for Tuesday, with the provision if any should be under consideration and unfinished at the time of adjournment that bill should continue until finished.

Mr. COBB. The Committee on Public Lands desires to take up land-grant bills.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask that Thursday next be set apart for the District business, under the same conditions as to-day; that is, that we shall not lose it.

The SPEAKER. The order would have to be changed in one respect. As it now reads, the second Monday, after the call of States and Territories, is set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. As there will be no call, it should be changed to read immediately after the reading of the Journal or after the morning hour.

A MEMBER. Say after the morning hour.

Mr. HEMPHILL. After the reading of the Journal, with the understanding that we shall not lose it except by unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. It can not be lost except by unanimous consent, or by raising the question of consideration as it is called up and refusing to consider it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Very well; if the District business is postponed to-day I want it to be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman to the House. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia be postponed for to-day, and that next Thursday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart under the order already made for the consideration of business called up by that committee. Is there objection?

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. No other business can break in or interfere.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already so stated.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I only wanted that to be definitely understood.

Mr. LONG. Would that order take precedence of privileged matters, for instance such as conference reports?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, if such reports were offered before the House has gone into the consideration of the special order fixed for that day. But if the committee shall have begun the consideration of that business set apart exclusively for that day, the conference reports could not be received, the Chair thinks.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to ask if that order will take precedence of bills forfeiting land grants from the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. It would, just the same as to-day. No change would be made in the order, the same rule applying to Thursday as would apply to-day.

Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. 8974) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of time, that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HEPBURN. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, and the Clerk will report the first amendment.

The first amendment of the Senate was read and concurred in.

The second amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendment No. 3 was concurred in.

Amendment No. 4 was non-concurred in.

Amendment No. 5 was concurred in.

Amendments Nos. 6, 7, and 8 were non-concurred in.

Amendment No. 9 was concurred in.

Amendment No. 10 was read, as follows:

On page 5 of the printed bill, line 101, insert the name "Amzi Smith;" so that it will read: "Superintendent of the document-room, Amzi Smith, $2,592," &c.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order on that amendment; and I will repeat now what I said when that subject was before the House on a former occasion.

The same clause of the Constitution which authorizes the House to elect its Speaker authorizes also the appointment of its other officers, and the Senate has no business with the action of the House in the election of its Speaker or the appointment of its officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. But this is a Senate appointment.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me complete my sentence. Nor has the House any business to participate, or to attempt to participate, in the appointment of the Senate employés. The Constitution authorizes each House to appoint its own officers. The House, so far as it is concerned—this House—has no power to appoint any officers for the Fiftieth Congress; and so, without going into the argument further, I assume that this is not only a violation of propriety on the part of one House interfering with the power of the other to elect or appoint its officers, but is also a violation of the Constitution. We have a distinct constitutional provision vesting in the House the appointment of its own officials; but so far as the appointments for the next Congress are concerned it is a matter over which we have no control, and I trust the point of order will be sustained. If the next Congress shall want the names of these persons inserted on the rolls as employés they will doubtless be placed there. They may be, or may not be, the proper persons to fill such appointments. But whether proper or otherwise, it is an improper proceeding on our part to undertake to place them there by law in opposition to the constitutional authority which is vested in each House to appoint its own officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think the views expressed by the gentleman from Texas on the substantial question are undoubtedly correct; but while this would be subject to a point of order under the rules of the House, being in its nature a legislative provision, it seems not to be subject to the point of order when it comes before the House for consideration as an amendment made by the Senate; and I believe that has been the uniform ruling. On the other point, the constitutional one, the right of the House to select its own employés, I have only this to say, that this provision is in the bill by an amendment of the Senate. We are simply called upon to concur in what I concede may not be entirely necessary on our part; but we are simply concurring in that provision as one of the amendments incorporated by the Senate relating to one of its own employés.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But is not our action as necessary as theirs to the perfection of this legislative proceeding?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Is the Senate afraid that it will let go on these men, and does it want us to help it?

Mr. MCMILLIN. That seems to be the trouble.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is rather saddening.

The CHAIRMAN. If this proposition were part of a House bill it would be subject to the point of order, but it is an amendment coming from the Senate, not subject to the point of order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want to consume time by taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but it is so manifestly out of the power of the House under the Constitution to legislate this man into office that I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this question is to be submitted to the Committee of the Whole on an appeal from the decision of the Chair I should like to have some statement made as to what has been the ruling hitherto.

Mr. HOLMAN. The ruling of the Chair is in conformity with what has been the uniform ruling on this question.

Mr. REAGAN. A violation of the Constitution is never sanctioned by any ruling. I shall withdraw, however, the appeal from the decision of the Chair, and ask the committee to non-concur in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. In obedience to the instructions of the Committee on Appropriations I submit the motion to concur in the amendment, stating it is regarded as merely the formal act of the House to complete the act of the Senate.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], with whom I usually agree, that it is singular that a clear and distinct violation of the Constitution of the United States should be considered a merely formal act.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state there is a difference in the Committee on Appropriations as to the propriety of the insertion of names in this bill. I am entitled to say I am in a minority in that committee upon this question. I do not think we ought to yield to the Senate the right to insert names unless we intend to insert names on the part of the House. This bill is to become a law, and the objection to inserting the names applies equally to the Senate officials as to the House officials. Therefore, as I object to the insertion of names in the House schedule, I hope this motion will not prevail, but that the House will non-concur.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that it is highly improper for us by legislative action to foist upon those who have the appointment these officers over whose appointment and removal they have no control. Furthermore, we will come to an amendment wherein the Senate has sought to place upon this bill the names of House employés without the consent of the officers who usually have the appointing power. I shall resist that. They are to be appointed by name; and the very same spirit that will force me to prevent allowing the Senate to say who shall be our officers makes me dissent from the proposition to dictate officers to the Senate. I think we should strike out all of these names and let the appointments go where the Constitution fixes them.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. OATES. I ask the gentleman if there is not a distinction in appointing these officers for the reason that the Senate is a continuing body?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Senate in the contemplation of the law is a continuing body. That is true. But that does not change either the constitutional or the legal feature; for it is notwithstanding its permanence at the same time the proper appointing power for its officers. And here we are assuming by this bill, which requires the consent of the Senate, the House, and the President of the United States to determine who shall be the Senate's officers.

I hope the amendment will be non-concurred in, and that we will place this bill where every one of its class ought to be, clean of these innovations.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to say a word on this amendment. The Senate have inserted after the words "superintendent of the document-room" the name "Amzi Smith," so that it reads:

Superintendent of the document-room, Amzi Smith, $2,592.

The Senate in its discretion put the name of this man into the bill because, in the judgment of the Senate no doubt, it desired that that man should be retained. The amendment comes to the House now for concurrence or non-concurrence.

Gentlemen say that the Senate has this power of appointment and that the House has nothing to do with the appointment. Well, for the sake of the argument, substantially admit that is so; yet the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] wants to non-concur. He does not want the Senate to have its way about it. Then he says it is not in accordance with the Constitution. I would be glad to know what clause of the Constitution prohibits a majority of the Senate from placing, by an amendment, the name of an employé they desire to retain in the bill and the House from assenting to that name coming into the law for the coming year. It may be that there is some clause in the Constitution that I have never read, some provision that proposes this kind of thing. If so, then the amendment amounts to nothing, because it is in conflict with the Constitution.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask the gentleman whether our assent is necessary?

Mr. CANNON. Our assent is not necessary that I know of, nor does the withholding our assent nullify the act. If we do assent, then by virtue of law this man's name for next year appears as the Senate desires it.

Mr. SOWDEN. If our assent is not necessary, why is it asked?

Mr. REED, of Maine. What is the object of this, anyway?

Mr. CANNON. The object, as I understand and presume it to be, is that it is the desire of the Senate that for twelve months to come Amzi Smith shall be that officer.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What is to prevent him being so without this?

Mr. CANNON. What is to prevent him being so with this?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Nothing with this; but what is to prevent him being so without it? Nothing but the Senate's changing its mind.

Mr. CANNON. The Senate may change its mind.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then the Senate is under the impression that it may change its mind, and, being afraid of that, it wants us to help it to keep from changing its mind. I would not help such a body in such an arrangement as that for a good deal.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has the power not to help it if he chooses.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is a power that I desire to exercise.

Mr. CANNON. But what I want to know is whether the gentleman finds any constitutional objection——

Mr. REED, of Maine. Oh, no. I am not in that line. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read article 1, section 3, clause 5, of the Constitution. After speaking, in clause 4, of the choice of President of the Senate, it says:

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The Constitution confers upon the Senate themselves the power of choosing their officers. Gentlemen say that the Senate requests the House to agree to the proposition in this bill. The House should never be requested by the Senate to violate the Constitution. I presume the purpose of this amendment is to keep some man in office and to guard against the possibility of his being turned out. Even though the Senate be a continuing body, if this is an officer that gives satisfaction, the Senate when the time comes to reappoint him can do so. Under the preceding section in the same article of the Constitution the House is given the power of choosing its Speaker and appointing its officers, and we can no more appoint an officer for either branch of the next Congress by law than we can by law elect the Speaker of the next House of Representatives. As to the question of comity, I trust that the Constitution has not become so antiquated, that we have not become so indifferent to it as the charter of our liberties, the guide of our legislative conduct, that a mere question of comity will induce us to set it aside. But if we concur in this amendment we shall do so in face of the Constitution. Why is it that a violation of the Constitution is insisted upon merely for the purpose of getting a clerk or a superintendent of the Senate document-room? Mr. Speaker, I trust that this House will not consent to any such course of action.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the question has been asked what reason the Senate had for putting this name in the bill. I desire to say that it is well known to most of us that this gentleman, Amzi Smith, has been in the employ of the United States Senate for some thirty-four years, and it appears that that body desires to compliment an old, faithful, and respected officer by specially naming him in this bill. Now I submit that it is rather small business for the House of Representatives to undertake to interfere with that commendable desire on the part of the other branch of the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, before I ask for a vote I will say that I agree with the views that have been expressed here, for I do not believe that this kind of legislation is proper upon an appropriation bill, and that, in making the motion of concurrence which I have made, I have simply expressed the view of the majority of the committee.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 11, 12, 13, and 14 were concurred in.

Amendment numbered 15 was read, as follows:

Line 138, strike out "25" and insert "26," so as to make it read: "For twenty-six clerks to committees, at $6 per day during the session," &c.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman to state if he knows the reason why the Senate has made that change?

Mr. HOLMAN. We have already non-concurred in the amendment which increases the number to twenty-six, so that we must non-concur in this in order to make the bill harmonious.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to amendments numbered 15 and 16. There is some very bad figuring there; besides, I think a bad principle. Amendment 15 provides for twenty-six clerks at $726 each, $18,876; and in the next amendment there is provision for thirty-two clerks at the same rate of pay, amounting to $23,230, making together $42,106. The Senate undertakes to provide a clerk for each Senator. Now, we all know that there are seventy-six Senators, and seventy-six clerks at $726 each would aggregate $55,176. Yet these two amendments of the Senate appropriate together only $42,106, so that there must be a deficiency of $13,070.

Again, the bill as it passed the House gave to the Senate $18,150 for twenty-five clerks, or $726 each. The additions made by the Senate amendments increase the amount to $42,106. Now, as there are twenty-six clerks to committees, and as the Senate amendments undertake to provide a clerk for each Senator who is not a chairman of a committee, there must be fifty of these clerks, whose pay at $726 each would aggregate $36,300 in addition to the $18,876, making altogether $55,176. So that there is appropriated $13,070 less than would appear to be required. How this deficiency is to be paid I do not know.

The question with me is, ought this House to vote an increased expenditure of $37,026, as provided in this amendment; or, if there is no other fund out of which the payment of these clerks can be made, ought we to provide for the expenditure of $23,956 more?

These amendments of the Senate are based upon the supposition that every Senator is entitled to a clerk. Senators have the right to ask such an allowance, and we have the right to refuse our assent. I venture the statement, which I think will be corroborated by every gentleman on this floor, that each member here on the average does as much work as any member of the Senate. When Senators and Representatives were elected we understood that our compensation was $5,000 a year, with mileage, and $125 for stationery. We took the contract with the implied understanding that this was to be the compensation. We have the constitutional power to increase that compensation. At the same time we know that it is, to say the least, doubtful policy to vote such an increase; and if we refer to the history of the past we find that the result has been very disastrous to those who hitherto have taken advantage of the constitutional right of the legislative branch of the Government to increase their own compensation.

I am opposed to the whole proposition, because it is wrong in principle, and particularly opposed to it because the terms of these amendments involve an expenditure of $13,070 more than we make appropriation for. I think that neither of these amendments ought to be concurred in; and they ought to be voted on together, not separately. Without noticing the connection of the two, the Committee of the Whole has already voted on the fifteenth amendment; but the two amendments must be taken together, if we are to consider them intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

The question being taken, the amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendment 17 was read, as follows:

Insert the following:
"For clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $6 per day during the session, $23,232."

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in amendments numbered 18 to 23, on page 7 of the printed bill. I ask that those amendments may be read together, and the question on concurrence be taken in gross, unless a separate vote be asked.

There being no objection, amendments 18 to 23 were read and concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that amendments 24 and 25, in which also the committee recommend concurrence, be read and voted on together.

There being no objection, amendments 24 and 25 were read and concurred in.

The twenty-sixth amendment was read, as follows:

After the words "Journal Clerk," in line 208 of the printed bill, insert "H. H. Smith."

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules in this case as he did upon a previous amendment, that as this proposition comes here as a Senate amendment it is not subject to a point of order, as it would be if it were a proposition originating in the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not so understand. I waive any discussion.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The Clerk read the twenty-seventh amendment of the Senate, as follows:

In line 289 insert "George A. Bacon;" so it will read:
"Office of Doorkeeper: For Doorkeeper, $3,000; and for hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $1,100; assistant doorkeeper (27) (George A. Bacon), $2,000, &c."

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in that amendment, with the amendment which is before the Clerk to insert the names of "John T. Chancey" and "C. W. Coombs."

Mr. McMILLIN. I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the amendment recommended by the committee to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10 of the bill insert "John T. Chancey;" and in line 24, after the word "messenger," insert "C. W. Coombs."

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point of order on the amendment in the bill and on the amendment to the amendment. I do not think it is necessary to argue the question, but I wish to state again this House of Representatives has no power to appoint officers of the next House of Representatives. These gentlemen may be entirely worthy, they may be entirely capable, they may be everything said in their behalf; I know nothing to the contrary of their being excellent officers; but there is no more reason for putting these men in than for putting a dozen others, except they have special friends on the floor.

We can no more appoint these men by this bill than we can appoint the next Speaker of the House of Representatives. One is just as competent to do and just as constitutional as the other. It is an injustice to the next House of Representatives, besides being unconstitutional. The next House of Representatives has the right to choose its own Speaker and to choose its other officers. Whatever may be the political complexion of the House has nothing to do with the question of the constitutional right of that House to select its Speaker and other officers.

This is not only violative of the Constitution, but it is at the same time a species of official favoritism which we ought not to permit. For, sir, it is never safe in legislation to trust to our sympathies or to our affections if we expect to discharge our duty faithfully. The word duty should be foremost whenever we can make it so in all human affairs. When we resolve to act in accordance with duty we will find we are right, but when we undertake to act from sympathy to create offices or to fill offices simply because we sympathize or are partial to men, we are departing from our duty as legislators. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will be stricken out.

I desire to say further, although I believe I understood the chairman to say the amendment inserted by the Senate would not be subject to the point of order the same proposition would be subject to in this House, that in my judgment it is subject to the point of order, that the amendment made by the Senate is subject to the same point of order as if it had been made in the House; that if we were not true to the Constitution certainly ought to have its due force when it makes a specific provision on this subject, and it ought not to be permitted to be violated.

Mr. McMILLIN. To make assurance doubly sure and to take a bond of fate, I propose to make the point of order simply against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what the gentleman from Texas did.

Mr. McMILLIN. He made the point of order against all.

Mr. HOLMAN. And separately against each.

Mr. McMILLIN. I want to be sure, but if the Chair feels constrained to rule against the point of order on the first amendment, I want to insist upon the point of order against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana in charge of the bill, against which undoubtedly the point of order will lie.

I have nothing to say against these officers; I am willing to admit they serve faithfully and well, and the fact of good service will go far to recommend them to the officers of the House when appointments are made next year. I am utterly opposed to the appointment by legislative action of men who can not be reached through officers of the House in case of their dereliction of duty. These gentlemen will be retained if they are faithful in their service, but I wish it to be easy to get rid of them if they are vicious. I do not think they will be vicious, but the safe rule is to keep the appointments where the law fixes them, so if necessary to get rid of them it can easily be done.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to say a word or two upon the point of order. I hold in my hand the law making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses for the year ending June 30, 1886, and it is rather an interesting act in view of the point of order and the criticisms made by the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Tennessee. I ask the attention of the Chair to it for two reasons, first to show the absence of any regulation to prevent putting these names in the bill.

First I find a second assistant doorkeeper, George A. Bacon; next I find a provision for the two laborers named in charge of the water-closet; next I find for the two cloak-room men, one on each side of the Hall, now longest in the service of the House; next a provision for John T. Chancey, an employé, $1,500; next I find one department messenger, C. W. Coombs, $2,000, and the names of the two parties that are proposed to be added by way of amendment on the motion to non-concur.

On the sundry civil bill, a bill peculiarly under the charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, not content with naming these officers by law, I find he has named one Pickens as an annual page at $900 a year, placed there upon the motion of the present minister to Turkey, Mr. Cox, in this House. Next, I call the particular attention of the Chair and gentlemen to this clause, as well as the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], because he participated in this legislation, which was peculiarly a child of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and I will read it:

Fourteen messengers on the soldiers' roll, under the control of the Doorkeeper, at $1,200 each; and hereafter messengers on the soldiers' roll shall not be subject to removal except for cause reported to and approved by the House.

In other words, not for the coming year but hereafter provision is made of that character permanent in its nature.

Mr. REAGAN. That power extends only to the House that appoints them, not to the House that does not appoint them.

Mr. CANNON. Ah! but that power is fixed by the law, and until it is changed it must be obeyed.

Mr. REAGAN. But it only extends to the House having the appointment, and not to any other House to be hereafter elected.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Texas himself sat silent under the lead of the gentleman from Indiana and put that provision into the bill providing for the messengers upon the soldiers' roll and that they should be hereafter retained.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that is not a provision naming them for appointment.

Mr. CANNON. But I bring up these instances in the main for the attention of the Chair to show that under the uniform practice of the House this character of legislation has gone into the appropriation bills and is not subject to the point of order, and that in the absence of any permanent law providing for the appointment of these people this law would control the decision of the Chair in determining the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend will remember that the law in regard to the soldiers' roll does not name the persons so appointed, but simply provides for them as a class.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, provides for them as a class; but that class is composed of the individuals then upon the soldiers' roll, the persons on the roll at the time the rule was passed, and who had been there for a great many years, some of them, largely under the lead of the gentleman from Indiana himself.

Mr. REAGAN. Why have they to be appointed every session of Congress if that power exists and that provision is permanent?

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Illinois should take into consideration the fact that no point of order was made on those provisions. If it had been it probably would have been stricken from the bill. And, again, I want to ask him a question whether or not under the Constitution the law is not absolutely void as far as it attempts to control the action of the next House of Representatives?

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is not a permanent law.

Mr. COBB. But suppose it is. The Constitution provides that the House of Representatives shall select its own officers; and the House has no more power under the Constitution to appoint the employés of the next House than I have to appoint my friend from Illinois to Congress.

Several Members addressed the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. I believe I have the floor. At last I have a gentleman on that side to tell us wherein the Constitution prohibits this legislation, and he tells us that we can not bind the next House. Very well; let us admit it. But it is not proposed to bind the next House, but this House, by this amendment. Now, so far as this House is concerned, it does not go out of existence until the 4th of March next.

Mr. REAGAN. What has that to do with the question before the committee? These are appointments by the next Congress, and I would like to know how it applies to the question under consideration.

Mr. CANNON. It proposes to bind this House from now until the 4th day of next March.

Mr. REAGAN. But this provision extends beyond the 4th of next March.

Mr. CANNON. Then, according to your own logic, beyond that time it is void.

Mr. REAGAN. You hold then it is good law for six months, but bad law for a year?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman himself holds that. I hold it is good law all through.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; I do not hold it.

Mr. CANNON. I hold it is good law for the year to come, the time during which this appropriation runs, so far as that is concerned. But I was only answering the gentleman's own argument from his own standpoint; and it is sometimes quite hard to do that, for the gentleman from Texas can take more standpoints, so far as I have noticed, than any other gentleman on this floor on either side of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the next House will not be organized until long after this appropriation is exhausted. It is not binding on the officers of the next House.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. Now, sir, I do not think that I desire to say anything further on this point of order. I will state again, in the law for the year 1886 the names of Coombs and Chancey are retained; but I believe it is competent for a majority of this House now to say either with or without the concurrence of the Senate that these two men shall continue to serve it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says no. Well, what is his plan? His plan is that he, the gentleman from Texas, by the aid of a Doorkeeper, can set at defiance three hundred and twenty-four members of this House. Now, I do not think under the Constitution or anywhere else he can find that power; because I believe if the fathers, looking forward with a prophetic glance at the time the Constitution was adopted, had foreseen the gentleman from Texas was to be a member of this House and would make this point of order, and if they had intended to give the gentleman from Texas and the Doorkeeper power against the other three hundred and twenty-four members of the House, they would have expressly provided for it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have the most profound respect for the opinions of my friend from Texas upon points of order as well as upon almost every other question. But I conscientiously believe he is at fault today in the position he has taken in regard to this amendment. The name of George A. Bacon was inserted as an amendment in the Senate.

Mr. COBB. Was it not done, too, at your suggestion?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am glad to have an opportunity to give information on that point to the gentleman from Indiana and to correct a very erroneous impression that exists in his mind. The Senate inserted the name of George A. Bacon. That is not subject to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas, because the Chair has already so decided.

Before I go further on the point of order I want to explain the reason why the name of George A. Bacon appears. The name appeared in the last bill, and the name of John T. Chancey also appeared in that bill for the reason that this House by a resolution adopted by unanimous consent——

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I do not think the merits of the question should be discussed on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If my other friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had possessed his soul in patience for a few moments he would have discovered I was speaking strictly to the point of order. If my friends from Indiana can only remain in their seats long enough to allow me to get through with my statement I will be much obliged.

I was about to furnish the reasons why these names went into the bill and I want to emphasize the position that those two names especially under the rules of this House may rightfully go into this bill. As I was about to remark when interrupted, by resolution of this House, a continuing resolution, these offices were created for George A. Bacon and John T. Chancey by name.

If you will look to the resolution introduced by my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] in the Forty-seventh Congress, you will find it there declared that hereafter George A. Bacon shall be employed as the second assistant doorkeeper of this House. That resolution was substantially a copy of one introduced years ago by Alexander H. Stephens, inserting the name of John T. Chancey. What followed? When the bill was being made up in the last Congress it became necessary to abolish those offices or to couple with that provision the names of these two men for whom these offices were created.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Another Indiana man!

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman is confusing two things. George A. Bacon is named in this bill for assistant doorkeeper; in the other he was named as second assistant—two distinct offices.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is a little difference in the verbiage used to describe him this year. The word "second" is stricken out, but the rest of the language is retained.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will suggest to my friend——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not let Tennessee come at me too. I want to get at my point, and do not desire to be interrupted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suppose the gentleman would like to be corrected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. After a while. These two names are in this bill in pursuance of a resolution which has not yet been repealed and which still stands in force.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] inquired as to whether I had not caused the name of George A. Bacon to be inserted in the Senate. The facts are these: I found from a copy of the bill as reported from the Senate committee that every name had been restored to the bill except that of Bacon and perhaps these two pages, and I suggested to a member of that committee that if they intended to restore any names they should also restore the name of Bacon. Somebody had been there before me, and had caused all the other names to be put in, while Bacon's name was left out.

Why so? Because the assistant doorkeeper was an Indiana man, and would perhaps be crowded out if Bacon's name was retained. I simply said to one of the members of the Senate committee, "If you put in all these other names I wish you to put in Bacon's name also," and it was done; but the name was written in only in pencil, and when Senator BECK got hold of the bill in the Senate for the purpose of striking out the names Bacon's name escaped his attention, because it had not been printed in the bill. Now, I want to say to the House that if John T. Chancey's name and these other names of employés can not go into the bill I do not desire to see Mr. Bacon's name go in. I want them all to be treated alike, and as the House has stricken out the name of an officer of the Senate inserted by the Senate and has stricken out H. H. Smith's name, I think it is perhaps proper that all the names should be stricken out. I do not contend for any special exception in favor of Mr. Bacon, and never have asked for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on another point I think my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is wholly in error. He assumes that we are providing an officer for the next Congress. We are not. We are simply providing an officer for the second session of this Congress, and we have a perfect right to do that under the rules of the House and under the Constitution. We do not seek to insert here the name of any officer for the next Congress. It is true that this appropriation continues until the 30th day of June next, but so do all the permanent officers of this House continue in office until the next Congress assembles in December, 1887. We are simply providing here officers for the second session of this Congress, and therefore our action does not fall under the strictures of the gentleman from Texas. I maintain that it is within the power of this House under its rules to retain the names of George E. Bacon and John T. Chancey in this bill. Indeed, I think that every one of these names ought to be retained, for the reason that we have tried them and found them efficient and worthy, and I for one would rather intrust the appointment to the majority of this House than put it in the hands of any one man. The proposition here is simply to suggest to the House the propriety of selecting certain of its own officials instead of delegating that power to one man. But in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I say again that if the House determines to strike out Mr. Chancey's name upon the point of order, or in any other way, and the names of these other officials or employés, then I am willing that Mr. Bacon's name should be struck out also.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to answer one point that has been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. He says that existing law provides for the appointment of George A. Bacon as assistant doorkeeper. Now, there is no such law on the statute-book and never was.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I said a resolution of this House.

Mr. COBB. There is no resolution authorizing such an appointment as is provided for by this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I beg leave to differ with my friend.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from Illinois will keep himself in peace a few minutes I will explain to him the difference. The resolution to which he refers provided for the appointment of an assistant doorkeeper to perform service in the folding-room. That was George A. Bacon. But this bill provides for an "assistant doorkeeper, George A. Bacon, $2,000," to perform duty on the floor of this House. Now there is no law and there never was any law making Mr. Bacon assistant doorkeeper here. Therefore I say there is no existing law by which this provision can be sustained.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. COBB. The gentleman can not correct me, because I believe I am right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The resolution reads "George A. Bacon, assistant doorkeeper, to be employed in the document-room."

Mr. COBB. Exactly; and this provision reads, "assistant doorkeeper, George A. Bacon, $2,000." There is no similarity between the two provisions at all. One makes Mr. Bacon assistant doorkeeper performing duty on the floor of the House, the other an assistant doorkeeper performing duty in the folding-room. I would like to have the gentleman point out the similarity between the provision in the bill and the provision in the resolution upon which he relies. This name ought to go out, and if it does not go out on the point of order I will at the proper time move to strike it out.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Illinois, with an air of triumph, assumes that I desire to confer upon the Doorkeeper the power of making this appointment, and he says that I am setting up myself and the Doorkeeper in a position over all other members of this House. Why, Mr. Chairman, I am astonished that a gentleman who has been here so long and who is so active and efficient a member of the House should not know that this House itself has provided that the Doorkeeper shall make this appointment, and that in the position I take I am not antagonizing the House, but am, on the contrary, maintaining its authority. I suppose, however, that a gentleman so hardly driven as the gentleman from Illinois was to find an argument might very easily fall into such an error as that. Now suppose we make this appointment by law and say that this particular man shall have this office and the salary attached to it, and suppose he dies, can we appoint another officer under this law during the time the law runs? By making this appointment in the law, do we not mako the office his office and the salary his salary until the 30th of June, 1887?

The gentleman from Illinois also assumed that this would be good law for the first half of the year, and that therefore it ought not to be ruled out. Mr. Speaker, I have heard of a great many nice distinctions taken in the practice of the law by all kinds of lawyers, but I have never before heard such a proposition as that. If this can be made a law at all, it runs until the 30th day of next June. This officer must have his salary until that time; and I infer that should he meanwhile die, his heirs would be entitled to the salary up to that period. More than that, no other person could be appointed to the position during that time without the enactment of an additional law or rule of the House, unless we propose to have two persons appointed to the same position.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to prolong the discussion on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two questions of order raised by the gentleman from Texas and one by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. REAGAN. One of my points of order was against the provision in the Senate amendment, and the other against the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. The first question raised relates to the amendment placed in the bill by the Senate inserting the name of George A. Bacon. The other relates to the amendment in relation to various other House employés whose names it is proposed to insert in this bill—a proposition having no necessary connection with the amendment of the Senate. The Chair wishes to call attention to several provisions of the rules of the House, but will first read a clause of the Constitution of the United States with which gentlemen are all very familiar:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

The Chair assumes that this language of the Constitution excludes the appointment of officers of the House in any other manner than is here provided. Rule II of the House, relating to the election of officers, is in this language:

There shall be elected by a viva voce vote at the commencement of each Congress, to continue in office until their successors are chosen and qualified, a Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Postmaster, and Chaplain, each of whom shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and ability, and to keep the secrets of the House, and each shall appoint all of the employés of his department provided for by law.

Rule XXVIII provides that—

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

The Chair thinks that the amendment now proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, if adopted, would be pro tanto a change of the rules of the House as to the mode of selecting its officers. The point of order, therefore, on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate amendment is sustained; but the point of order to the Senate amendment is overruled.

Mr. COBB. I move now to strike out the name of "George A. Bacon." This amendment has been put in by the Senate, and I think altogether without warrant. The House passed upon this proposition when this bill was pending here——

Mr. CANNON. I desire to make a point of order before it is too late. I make the point that a motion to strike out the Senate amendment is not in order.

Mr. COBB. Well, I will move then to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate. When this bill was before the House it contained, as will be remembered, a provision in about the same form as this amendment of the Senate, amending the old law. I then raised a point of order, which was sustained, and the name, "George A. Bacon," was struck out. Now, the Senate undertakes by this amendment to make an assistant doorkeeper for the House. That body has always complained of this House undertaking to legislate with reference to its officers. The Senate has claimed the right to regulate the compensation which its employés should receive; and time and again that question has been made an issue between this House and the Senate, for the reason that this House believed the Senate was paying its employés too high compensation. Many of the older members of this House will recollect the length of time which was spent a year or two ago in a contest between the two Houses on this very question. The Senate would not yield, but insisted that it had the right to regulate its own officers and to pay them such compensation as it believed proper; that the House of Representatives had nothing to do with the matter. The House finally yielded to the Senate, and the employés of that body are now paid, and have been paid, more than the employés of the House doing corresponding duty. The Senate in the present case undertakes to come in here and say to the House who shall be its assistant doorkeeper. I insist that it is beyond the province of the Senate thus to dictate who shall be the officers of the House. If that body will not allow us any voice in controlling the compensation of its officers, I insist with greater reason that it has no right to come here and dictate to us who shall be our officers. It is an interference to which I for one will not submit for a single moment. If we once yield this principle to the Senate that body will in the end dictate the appointment of our other officers. I trust, therefore, the House will not in this case concede so important a principle. Let us regulate the appointment of our own officers. The object of this amendment is to legislate somebody out of office and to put somebody else in. I am not in favor of this way of getting rid of officers. If we have doing duty for this House officers whom we ought not to have, there is a method by which they can be removed; but with my consent it can not be done through the dictation of the Senate. I I trust, therefore, that the House will non-concur in this amendment to strike out the name of "George A. Bacon."

Mr. RANDALL. I think we understand sufficiently to have a vote. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. STRUBLE. I hope the Chair will state the question upon which we are called to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. I move to concur in the amendments of the Senate, and that under the rule, I insist, takes precedence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be stated on the motion to concur.

The Senate amendment was non-concurred in.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twenty-eighth of the Senate: Insert the names of "A. H. Pickens and H. T. Lyle;" so it will read:

"Two chief pages (A. H. Pickens and H. T. Lyle), at $900 each."

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to non-concur in that amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am instructed by the committee to move concurrence.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to be heard for a moment on that amendment. This amendment of the Senate is as follows, if I can have the attention of the committee, and I will not occupy it but for a few minutes:

The bill provides for two chief pages, at $900 each. The Senate amendment is to insert the names of A. H. Pickens and H. T. Lyle. One of these chief pages is provided for under the lead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the sundry civil bill for the year 1886, namely, A. H. Pickens. The other chief page, H. T. Lyle, was recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, the object of appointing these chief pages was that we might have two competent pages on the floor of the House, maintaining one on that side of the House, where he has been for years, and one on this side of the House.

Gentlemen understand about this page business as well as I do. They are very clever boys, yet most of them are too young to be expert in the performance of their duties.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not a fact that the name of H. T. Lyle was never borne in the bill before?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was it not inserted in the Senate?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it was inserted in the Senate. Is there any other question the gentleman wants to ask me? If the gentleman has any further question to ask I should be very glad to answer it.

Mr. McMILLIN. How was it the Senate came to insert these names?

Mr. CANNON. I will give you all the information I have about it with great pleasure. When the Senate reported this bill to the Senate from the Committee on Appropriations they reported it without any consultation or communication with me. I think when it was reported it had the names of Chancey and several other employés, as the gentleman will find if he will examine it. After it was reported for the first time I went to a Senator and suggested to him that as the bill was originally reported to the House it had the names of A. H. Pickens and H. T. Lyle in it, and if any names were to go in I should be glad to see them restored. I presume it was in consequence of that suggestion of mine these names have been inserted in this bill. I do not know that is the case, but I suspect it is.

To come back now to the point where I was interrupted. I know these gentlemen who are the chief pages here. H. T. Lyle is on this side of the House. I believe he lives in the District. Certainly he is not from my district or my State. If he has any politics, I do not know whether they are Republican or Democratic, and I do not care. But I do know and believe he is one of the best pages who has ever been in this House. I do not say this to detract from the service rendered by others. To many of us on this side of the House his services have become indispensable. A. H. Pickens, the chief page on the other side, is equally competent. He was put in the bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in conference. I thought it was proper, under the circumstances, to concur with the Senate. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. McMILLIN. All I wish to say in support of my motion to non-concur is this: As has been seen by those who have examined the rules and Constitution, the power is fixed in this House to select its own officers. These names were inserted in the bill when it was first reported to the House, but the House in its discretion saw fit to strike them out. These names have been restored by action of the Senate. The Senate amendment proposes to say who shall be officers of this House. For that reason I have moved to non-concur.

Mr. CANNON. An additional word. Gentlemen of this House seem to have grown suddenly most wonderfully strict and wonderfully virtuous. Why you can turn through this legislative, &c., appropriation act for year ending June 30, 1886, and you will find just such designations to places, not only in the House and in the Senate, but in the Executive Departments of the Government.

I have one before me now, where under the lead of the gentleman from Indiana year after year this provision has prevailed in the appropriation bill, and I read it:

For First Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000, and while the office is held by the present incumbent, $500 additional.

That is under the Executive, not under the House or the Senate, but an appointment under the Executive. That is written into the law in this very bill and has been there many years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; and this man has been some fifty years in the service.

Mr. RANDALL. We give him additional pay while he remained there, but that does not stop his being turned out.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that, but I am calling attention to this special provision by name of employés. You have gone outside now of the legislative department and invaded the executive with the same provision.

I am quite sure if it suits the majority of the House to say that the Republican side of the House, and the same on that side to some extent, shall not be well served by competent pages I have no objection. I can stand it as well as you can. But it is a gracious thing to do. If, however, your stern sense of constitutional duty rises up like a tower and compels you to say we shall not be served by at least one page on each side of the House who is thoroughly competent, then, in God's name, preserve your oaths but enforce the Constitution, But, after all, I think perhaps it would be just as wise to say that, while you violated the Constitution in a dozen other places it would hardly hurt to make a little violation here, where the object to be attained is one of convenience to all the members of the House in the transaction of the public business. All of this talk about designating a page or an officer in an appropriation bill to serve the House is in my opinion just so much twaddle.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is twaddle to put the names in.

Mr. COMPTON. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, my friend from Tennessee would pretend that because this provision comes from the Senate it is therefore in derogation of the dignity of the House, because, as a matter of fact, I think these names were originally reported in the bill, but were stricken out in the House on the point of order and have now been restored.

That is the whole sum of it. Further, as I understand it, I do not know how correctly, but such is my impression, the restoration of the names in the bill meets with the approval of the majority of the committee.

Now, what is the purpose of the House? As has been well said by the gentleman from Illinois, the purpose is to secure the services of competent, faithful, and efficient men; and certainly none are more competent, faithful, and efficient than the two young men who are named here in this amendment.

Again, if the House agrees to this amendment it will be the action of the House appointing its own employés, for without its concurrent action this provision would amount to nothing. If the House votes it down it goes for nothing. I appeal then to the House to consider the question upon its own merits and not consider it upon any question involving a mere technicality as to the dignity of the House, which is supposed to be offended by the incorporation of such a provision as an amendment at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust we will have a vote now.

The question being taken on concurring in the Senate amendment, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 56.

Mr. MCMILLIN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. MCMILLIN and Mr. CANNON were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 80.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Amendments numbered 30 and 31 were concurred in.

Amendments numbered 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, and 43 were severally non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 44 was concurred in.

Amendments numbered 45, 46, and 47 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 48, 49, and 50 were concurred in.

Amendment numbered 51 was read, as follows:

Strike out, under the head of "Treasury Department," the words "an inspector of electric-light plants, gas, and fixtures for all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $1,900."

Mr. REED, of Maine. Why not concur in this amendment? It is apparently in the interest of economy.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee thinks that possibly this is an indefensible position; but it may not be; and we have thought proper to non-concur in the Senate amendment to find out the object of the Senate in striking it out.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I did not suppose that my friend from Indiana needed evidence on that point to show that it was a decrease of expenditure.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 52 was non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 53 was concurred in.

Amendments numbered 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, and 65 were non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 66 was read, as follows:

Strike out the following provision:
"For additional force for continuing the adjustment of the accounts of the Soldiers' Home in the office of the Second Auditor, under section 4818, Revised Statutes: Seven clerks at $840 each, and one at $720 per annum, $6,600."

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence in this amendment of the Senate. The object of striking out this provision is not known to the Committee on Appropriations, and for the purpose of ascertaining that they have recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the committee ought to give some reason for non-concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will see at once that you can not perceive what the motive is in striking it out. The language of the provision is "for additional force for continuing the adjustment of these accounts." I suppose the gentleman from Kentucky is well aware what that is. Heretofore we have appropriated $10,000 a year for that purpose.

It was proposed to continue that appropriation under two provisions contained in this bill as it went from the House to the Senate. The Senate thought it desirable to strike those provisions out. What their purpose is is not known to the House Committee on Appropriations.

The House has always regarded the question as an embarrassing one. It is claimed the Government is owing the Soldiers' Home in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 from pay of deserters, fines, forfeitures, &c., which belong under the law to the Soldiers' Home. The Senate may have some plan of adjusting that matter other than the looking over all these accounts for a long series of years. And for the purpose of having an opportunity to understand the motive of the Senate it is recommended to non-concur.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose if the House non-concurs in this amendment in addition to non-concurrence in the former amendment for a like force in the Comptroller's office it will throw the whole question into conference. And I take it that the conference committee, subject to subsequent appropriation by the House, might have jurisdiction to propose some scheme other than the auditing of these accounts.

Gentlemen will understand after the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that under the act establishing the Soldiers' Home here at Washington there is due from pay of deserters, from pay of soldiers who have deceased and had no legal representatives, from fines levied by courts-martial, &c., probably, as the gentleman stated, in the neighborhood of $2,000,000. Now for four or five years we have provided a force at an expense of $25,000 or $35,000 a year to audit these claims, and I understand they have got about as far as the year 1844, and at this rate it would take thirty or forty years yet to fully examine the books and audit these claims.

I have the impression that the Senate thought it wise, or was of the opinion, that we should give a lump sum to the Soldiers' Home at once in lieu of these amounts, or that we should appropriate from year to year and save this amount for the force engaged in auditing the accounts. I must say for one I am in harmony with that view, because in the end, if we go on auditing these claims, we will have to pay them anyhow to the Soldiers' Home, which exists by our legislation, and which we must necessarily support. I think it would be wise to arrange to give a sum in lump in satisfaction of all these claims, and do away with this constant spending of money for thirty or forty years to come.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is safer to non-concur. That gives the committee of conference full jurisdiction of the subject; and we will learn whether the Senate desires to make such an appropriation as has been suggested. If so, it can be inserted in the sundry civil or in the deficiency bill.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendments 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, and 77 were non-concurred in.

Amendments 78, 79, 80, 81, under the head of "Office of Construction of Standard Weights and Measures," were read, as follows:

Strike out "and mechanician."
Insert "one mechanician at $4 per day."
Strike out the word "laborer" and insert the word "watchman."
Strike out "$2,225" and insert "$3,537."

Mr. HOLMAN. It may be that upon a further examination it may appear that some additional force is required in this small office. Meanwhile the committee have recommended non-concurrence.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

Amendments 82, 83, 84, 85 were concurred in.

Amendments 86, 87, 88 were non-concurred in.

Amendment 89 was read, as follows:

In line 1114 strike out "$4,000" and insert "$4,500;" so that it would read: "Office of assistant treasurer at Baltimore: For assistant treasurer, $4,500."

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. CANNON. I think the recommendation was to concur.

The question being taken, the amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendment 90 was non-concurred in.

Amendment 91 was read, as follows:

In line 1124 strike out "$4,500" and insert "$5,000;" so that it would read: "Office of assistant treasurer at Boston: For assistant treasurer, $5,000."

Mr. LONG. I move to concur in this amendment. This matter was considered in the Committee of the Whole when the bill was under consideration a week or two ago. The salary of the assistant treasurer at Boston has been $5,000 for a number of years. The bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations reduced the salary to $4,500. In Committee of the Whole it was moved to amend by restoring the salary to $5,000, the same as it has been for the last few years. The Committee of the Whole voted by a large majority of some 80 to 40 to restore the salary to $5,000. When the matter was reported to the House this Boston item got mixed with some others, and the House had perhaps forgotten the discussion in the Committee of the Whole. The result was that the amendment was rejected, and the bill went to the Senate with $4,500 as the salary of this officer. The Senate has now restored it to $5,000. I move to concur in the amendment. The reasons are: First, $5,000 is a reasonable sum.

The amount of money involved is some $126,000,000. As I said before, the salary for a number of years has been $5,000. The question is very different from what it would be if we were establishing the salary, for the question now is whether we shall cut down a salary which is already fixed at $5,000. No reason exists for cutting it down. No reason exists why this House should impose a fine upon the assistant treasurer at Boston by reducing his salary $500. It is very difficult to find a man to fill the place on account of the large bond that is required. In behalf of the faithful officer who now occupies the place, in behalf of the man who shall next fill the place, should another be selected, in view of the large bond and the large responsibility, in view of the rate of salary usually attaching to such an office as this, I trust that the House will concur in the Senate amendment, and the amount of this salary be kept what it has been.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the unrecorded vote of the Committee of the Whole favored keeping this salary up, but when the recorded vote came in the House it was in favor of letting the salary stand at the amount originally recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was non-concurred in—yeas 50, nays 64.

Amendment No. 92 was concurred in.

Amendment 93 was non-concurred in.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, amendments 94, 95, 96, 97, and 98 were read together and non-concurred in.

Amendments 99 and 100 were read; amendment 99 inserting in lines 1180 and 1181 the following: Assistant cashier and vault clerk, $3,200; and amendment 100 striking out in line 1210 "sixty-five thousand two" and inserting "sixty-eight thousand four."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, since these amendments were considered by the Committee on Appropriations the subtreasurer at New York has been in this city, and as the members of the committee are present and I desire that this subject may be further considered by the conferees of the two Houses, I will ask that, as a matter of form, these two amendments be non-concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL. I individually have no objection to that course.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that amendments 105, 106, and 107 be reported together.

The amendments were read; amendment No. 105 increasing appropriation for the salary of the governor of Alaska from $2,600 to $3,000, and amendment No. 106 increasing the appropriation for the salary of the judge of Alaska from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence in those amendments.

Mr. BURNES. I move to concur in the three Senate amendments that have just been read. The first one restores the salary of the governor to $3,000, the amount fixed by the law organizing the Territory of Alaska. The second amendment restores the salary of the district judge to $3,000, the amount of that salary having been fixed in the law organizing the Territory. The third amendment simply has reference to the amount of these two salaries. I can not add any force to the declaration of the law that each of these officers shall have a salary of $3,000 a year, yet I submit that the governor of Alaska and the judge in Alaska ought to receive $3,000 a year each, not only because it is not too great a salary, but because the law has fixed it, and those gentlemen have gone to the place of their duties under the belief that they were each to receive that salary.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the governor there now?

Mr. BURNES. He is there now so far as I know. The judge is there, and I presume the governor is there. It is a hardship, I had almost said an outrage, that gentlemen are sent off two or three thousand miles in the belief that they will be protected by the statute law of the country, and after they have gone to their fields of labor to have their salaries cut down in order to deprive them of $400 each. It is pitiful, and I submit it to this House with absolute confidence.

Mr. HILL. I hope the committee will take into consideration one or two facts in connection with this Alaska matter. In the first place, it must be remembered that it costs a governor from $500 to $1,000 a year more to live in Alaska than in any other Territory of the United States. There is only one steamship line by which communication can be had with the States, and that makes semi-monthly trips, and is to all intents and purposes a monopoly, charging just what it pleases for freight. Besides that, the opportunity for purchasing supplies for housekeeping there is very restricted, and prices are 50 per cent. higher than in other Territories which are accessible by railroad. Then there is to be added the expense of going and coming, which is about $300 more than in the case of any other Territory. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that where the law has fixed a salary for the governor of this far-off region it is an outrage for Congress to cut down that salary under the circumstances.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Are these officers allowed any mileage or traveling expenses?

Mr. HILL. They are allowed no mileage or expenses at all.

Mr. BURNES. None whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. Do not they usually go in a Government vessel?

Mr. HILL. I do not know how they go. I suppose they go the best way they can, as we all come to Washington. We generally come here on a railroad pass.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. HILL. A gentleman asked where the governor was. The governor of Alaska was here to attend some business in connection with his Territory, because that Territory has no Delegate in Congress, but he is now and has been for three or four weeks on his way back to his post of duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. He was here, I believe, a good while, and all his predecessors have been here ever since they were appointed.

Mr. HILL. Governor Swineford was in Alaska and staid there until he ascertained the wants of the Territory. He then came here and remained just five weeks, and he was before the Committee on Territories every day that he was here. He left here some four weeks ago, and is now on his way back to his post of duty. I know this, because I have been in communication with him since.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman give us some idea of what this officer does when he is up there?

Mr. HILL. I suppose he attends, like every other governor, to the duties which the law prescribes. What they are I do not know, for I was never there.

Mr. DOCKERY. The inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is not pertinent. If the office is a useless one, it ought to be abolished.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it ought to be.

Mr. DOCKERY. If so, bring in your bill, and if the necessary facts are exhibited I will vote to abolish the office. But the law at present provides this salary; and as the duties are performed at so remote a point, it seems to me the House ought to concur in this amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the highest salary we pay to any Territorial governor, except the governor of Alaska, is $2,600. The reason the salary of this particular governor was placed above the general level was that the office was provided for in a general bill, and it is always our experience that when we provide a salary by a separate act the salary is fixed above the general range. In former years the governors of all the Territories received $3,000 each. In 1876 these salaries were reduced to $2,600, and no higher salary has been paid since that time to any Territorial governor, except in this one instance. It is not believed the governor of that Territory has any duties to perform. Every winter for several years past he has been here at the capital. The Committee on Appropriations think a salary of $2,600 is ample.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, one word more. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana urges that $2,600 is the salary paid to other Territorial governors. Does he not know that we make a difference in the salaries of United States judges that these judges received higher pay in some districts than in others? Does he not know that the cost of living was higher a few years ago than it is now; and does he not know that there is a vast difference between living in Alaska and living, for instance, in Dakota? I have no doubt the gentleman himself would rather serve as governor of Dakota for $1,500 than in Alaska for $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Fifteen hundred dollars would be an ample salary.

Mr. HILL. I hope the gentleman does not estimate the usefulness of everybody else by his own. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why the governor of Alaska should receive a higher salary than the governor of any other Territory. In this very bill the salary of every other Territorial governor is fixed at $2,600. We propose that the governor of Alaska shall receive the same salary as the governors of Dakota, Idaho, Arizona, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, and I believe Washington. If we now agree to fix this salary at $3,000 there will naturally be an effort made to raise the salaries of the other Territorial governors to the same level.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; that is what will follow.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURNES to concur in the amendment of the Senate, there were—ayes 52, noes 35.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BURNES were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 45.

So the motion of Mr. BURNES was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. We shall have a vote in the House on this question.

The one hundred and eighth and one hundred and ninth amendments were read and concurred in.

The one hundred and tenth, one hundred and eleventh, one hundred and twelfth, and one hundred and thirteenth amendments were read and non-concurred in.

The one hundred and fourteenth, one hundred and fifteenth, one hundred and sixteenth, one hundred and seventeenth, and one hundred and eighteenth amendments were read and concurred in.

The one hundred and nineteenth amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the appropriations for "Office of Publication of Records of the Rebellion" the following:

"And hereafter the records prepared for publication under this appropriation shall contain only the records of the war of the rebellion covering contemporaneous events, arranged chronologically, according to the provisions of the act of June 23, 1874, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875. And the evidence taken by the court-martial on the trial of Fitz-John Porter, together with the report thereon by Judge Holt to President Lincoln, shall be printed in connection with matter already printed concerning the proceedings of said court-martial."

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in this amendment of the Senate with an amendment, to insert after the words "President Lincoln" the clause which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Also any papers on behalf of the defense in said court-martial directly connected with the proceedings of the same, and contemporaneous therewith, that have not been already published in any previous volume of said records.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a motion to concur takes precedence of the proposition to concur with an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I submit that a motion to concur without amendment must take precedence of a motion to concur with an amendment, because simple concurrence tends to an immediate agreement between the two Houses. The ground on which a motion to concur takes precedence of a motion for non-concurrence is that the motion to concur brings the two Houses more promptly to an agreement. The same reason must govern in this case, and give precedence to a motion to concur without amendment as against a motion to concur with an amendment.

The House must have the right to concur with the exact words of an amendment first. That must be the principle of parliamentary law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Maine is correct, and that the question on concurrence is first to be put.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I move to concur.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 75.

Mr. REED, of Maine. No quorum.

Mr. REED, of Maine, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 89.

So the House refused to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask that the question shall be put on the amendment of the committee to the amendment of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has already been read, but it will be read again.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. First, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask of the Chair this question. It is a parliamentary inquiry. If the House shall agree to concur with the amendment, of course that sends the bill, or rather the amendment, to the committee of conference. Do they then have jurisdiction of the whole subject-matter, or is their jurisdiction confined to consideration of the amendment of the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. The jurisdiction of the conference would be to the whole subject-matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair does not desire to rule on a matter which is not before him and probably never will be.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. For, sir, the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is a little broader than I thought it was. It was presented in the Committee on Appropriations, and if it is in order to speak of what occurred in the committee I may say to this extent at least, that the motion to concur with an amendment was adopted by the committee. My memory may be at fault, but I think the scope of the amendment as presented to the Committee of the Whole is broader than it was, or as I understood it to be, when offered in committee. It is, to my mind, too broad, because it contemplates the insertion in the record not merely of papers, or such part of the papers, as necessarily and properly form a part of the record of the case, but opens up a much wider range.

Mr. RANDALL. The word contemporaneous is there.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Of course; I understand perfectly that the word contemporaneous is used, but that might admit every magazine article, every suggestion ventured or cast on the wave of public opinion if it was only contemporaneously expressed or written.

If the amendment be adopted it should be confined to those papers which are pertinent to and form a part of the record of the trial.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the amendment is confined to such papers as are directly connected with the proceeding. How could it be any more explicit?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is there any objection to inserting apt words to limit the scope of the amendment as I have suggested?

Mr. HOLMAN. The words suggested do not make it any more explicit.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If they are not more explicit it will not hurt.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Why make the amendment broader than the amendment of the Senate, which is as follows:

And the evidence taken by the court-martial on the trial of Fitz-John Porter, together with the report thereon by Judge Holt to President Lincoln, shall be printed in connection with matter already printed concerning the proceedings of said court-martial.

The proper scope of the amendment it seems to me should be the papers in connection with the defense. I suppose that is properly included in the Senate amendment. This amendment says papers. I presume that would include argument of counsel for Fitz-John Porter, and the argument of counsel against him would not go in.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is the point, I will say to my colleague on the committee, against which I protest. I am not going to discuss the subject-matter treated of in the record, although I have solid convictions upon it; but I wish to state how this controversy arose. It appears that in the compilation of the annals of the war, which is the compilation of the record of events as they transpired, as the same is disclosed in the papers and manuscripts filed in the War Department, the documents which contained the account of the arraignment and trial of Fitz-John Porter were reached in their order.

It appears from an inspection of a volume of the compilation which has been completed in which the record of the trial and sentence of Fitz-John Porter should appear there is a very meager account of that proceeding. That brief statement being complete, the compiling officer, under what influence I do not know, leaps forward over the records of a quarter of a century and inserted in full display the entire proceedings of the Schofield board which reviewed the proceedings of the court-martial before which Porter was tried, and inserted also the proceedings of Congress for the relief of Porter and everything else that tended in any way to operate as a vindication of Fitz-John Porter. All that matter he inserts as a part of the record of 1862. He makes an entry nunc pro tunc, except he reverses the usual order by recording the events of the distant future as if they occurred to-day.

It may be urged, and I do not dispute it, that in one aspect of the case it is a matter of even-handed justice. But it was an unwarranted exercise of authority, and the Senate did not regard it as a proper thing to do in compiling the annals of 1862 to reach forward to and include the events occurring in 1886. Besides the record as made was unfair and partial, and to undo the wrong and correct the error as far as possible the Senate adopted the amendment which we are now seeking to amend. The Senate amendment seeks to require the compiling officer to include in his compilation such records at least as would suggest the character and enormity of Porter's offense and the judgment thereon of the men who had to judge of it on the trial, which as it appears is entirely garbled or singularly omitted.

The amendment, on the other hand, suggested by the Committee on Appropriations is—and there is a savor of abstract justice about it—that, in enlarging the record, that which properly pertains to the defense of Fitz-John Porter should go in. From the standpoint of the gentlemen on the other side that is fair, and I would not complain of it if the amendment was not so sweeping. If I catch it correctly as read from the desk it is too wide. It admits contemporaneous papers pertaining to the subject, the opinions of military men——

Mr. HOLMAN. Not pertaining to, but, as the language provides, "connected therewith."

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And that, the gentleman must see, would admit the argument of the defense.

Mr. RYAN. Certainly; for that is a part of the proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I only ask a moment to say to my friend I only want that which properly pertains to the trial to be inserted, and that does not include the argument of counsel.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will remember that there was some ambiguity in the language as drawn in the first instance, but as finally adopted by the committee it is in these words:

Any papers on behalf of the defense in said court-martial directly connected with the proceedings of the same and contemporaneous therewith that have not been already published in any previous volume of said records.

Which are exceedingly specific and definite words. It refers only to papers, as will be seen, directly connected with the proceedings.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana what he understands would be included under the language of that amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Only matters connected directly with the record.

Mr. CUTCHEON. With the record of the trial?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does the gentleman think that would include, for instance, the argument of Reverdy Johnson?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that if among the papers filed among the records there is a defense of Fitz-John Porter it would be admissible under this amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What kind of defense; the arguments of counsel?

Mr. HOLMAN. Any of the official files ought to go in.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think this can be arranged to work even-handed justice; at least I think it can be by a little amendment of the phrascology. The Senate amendment, my friend will observe, does not contemplate the introduction of argument of counsel against Fitz-John Porter, or, indeed, the argument of counsel at all. So I insist, if my friend pleases, that this amendment should be confined to the official records in the case, the official files, if you please, and the language of the amendment can certainly be so drawn as not to throw out a drag-net and bring in a thousand and one things that the friends of Fitz-John Porter would like to have inserted because they are soothing to his pride and a balm to his honor.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me to suggest to my friend from Ohio that the language of the Senate amendment seems to cover the point.

And the evidence taken by the court-martial—

That means the evidence for and against—on the trial of Fitz-John Porter, together with the report thereon of Judge Holt to President Lincoln, shall be printed, &c.

That includes the whole of the record proper. There is nothing in the record I take it but the evidence that is embodied in the record.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it proper that the report made and embodied in the record by Judge Holt——

Mr. BOUTELLE. He was the Judge-Advocate-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not care whether he was the Judge-Advocate-General or not, he was the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No, sir; he was the Judge-Advocate-General, and he could not be the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, whatever you call it, it is the same thing.

Mr. LAIRD. He was in fact the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say, is it right that that should go in and yet the defense of Fitz-John Porter should not be permitted to go in? I submit that is not a matter of fairness.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There can be no difficulty in getting in what pertains to the record; but I take it that is all that could or ought properly to be admitted. I suggest then this amendment, that after the word "Lincoln," in line 1722, insert:

Also any papers on behalf of the defense in said court-martial directly connected therewith and forming part of the official record in said case.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That would not do. You only get the papers of the defense that form a part of the official proceedings.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But the Senate amendment covers the entire report of the trial.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Senate amendment simply covers the evidence. Now you want to put in all the papers connected with the record, and you have no provision stating what papers shall be considered in connection with the record and which may be published.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We can say "for and against."

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana. This Senate amendment provides distinctly for printing all the evidence, does it not?

Mr. HOLMAN. It does.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And the only other provision in the Senate amendment is that there shall be printed one specific paper, the report of Judge Holt. Now, if anybody desires that any other paper shall be printed that is not a part of the evidence provided for by the Senate amendment, why not specify that specifically as the Senate amendment specifies the report of Judge Holt?

Let us know what the documents are you want to print. This makes a distinct and clearly understood statement. If you want to put in the argument of Reverdy Johnson, or this, that, or the other thing, say so specifically. But the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is broad enough to cover every newspaper article that appeared at the time.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no. The language is, "directly connected with."

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we will have a vote.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to amend his amendment so as to state specifically what he wants to print.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The proceedings of a court-martial consist, first, of charges and specifications; second, the evidence applicable thereto; and third, the summing up by the officers of the court; and then the finding. Counsel are permitted in general courts-martial, but arguments of counsel do not constitute a portion of the official proceedings.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do they not stand upon the same footing as the paper of Judge Holt?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Not on the same footing. His is an official report.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Colonel Scott, in the compilation of the records of the war, in part 2 of volume 12, when he reached that part of the annals relating to the second Bull Run campaign and the charges against General Fitz-John Porter, proceeded to embody in the annals of the rebellion the entire proceedings of the so-called Schofield board, an entirely unofficial board, convened without any authority of law. He came down near a quarter of a century to put into the current annals of the rebellion a chapter that was left to posterity, as we may say. Now the Senate amendment proposes to go back, and as an antidote to that to insert first the evidence taken upon the trial; and there are no papers that are directly connected with the trial that were not put in evidence or did not constitute a portion of the proceedings of the trial.

But when Congress came to publish the proceedings of the general court-martial, Congress printed, together with the official proceedings and with the summing up of Judge-Advocate-General Holt, the argument of Reverdy Johnson, and it constitutes part of the document which you will now find in the library.

The only other document not provided for by the Senate amendment, which provides for the evidence, the summing up, the report of Judge-Advocate-General Holt, is the argument of Reverdy Johnson, the counsel for Fitz-John Porter. Now, if any one wants that to go in alongside the argument of Judge Holt I have no objection. Only let us make it specific. Let the language be employed, "together with the argument or summing up of Reverdy Johnson, counsel for defendant."

I have no objection to the two papers going together. But, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has said, let us be specific; let us hedge this up so that there will be an end somewhere of stuffing the public records with the proceedings in this case.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan is a fair one.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan satisfactory to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject to be able to answer that question. My own judgment at this moment is that the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan is an entirely proper one; that the review by Judge Holt on the one side and the argument of Reverdy Johnson on the other are the two papers outside of the record which should come in. But, as I have said, I am not sufficiently familiar with the case to know what is proper and what is not. It seems to me the House can well afford to let this go to the conferees.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to make another suggestion. This amendment should be so framed that these things should be published together and not separately. That is not provided for here. They should not be printed in disjointed fragments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that can be easily provided for by the conferees. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The question being put, the chairman stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 70.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

Before the vote had been announced,

Mr. BUTTERWORTH said: While the tellers are waiting for gentlemen to vote I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that what I proposed was to add after the words in his amendment "directly connected with" the words "and a part of the official records in said cause."

Mr. HOLMAN (one of the tellers.) As I have already said, I think that may be left to the conferees.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The count was continued; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 36.

Mr. BOUTELLE. In consideration of an understanding to have a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this proposition, I do not insist on the point as to a quorum.

So (further count not being called for) the motion of Mr. HOLMAN to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment was agreed to.

Amendments numbered 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, and 126 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 131 and 132 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 133, 134, and 135 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 136 and 137 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 138 and 139 were concurred in.

Amendments numbered 140 and 141 were non-concurred in.

Amendment No. 142 was read, as follows:

Six additional persons, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, to aid him in determining appeals from the Commissioner of Pensions, and from whom he may constitute two additional boards of pension appeals, whose term of service shall expire at the close of the fiscal year 1887, at $2,000 each; two special inspectors connected with the administration of the public-land service, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and to be subject to his direction, at $2,500 each.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask my friend from Indiana a question. Will he please advise the House whether or not the effect of amendment No. 142 will not be to take a certain number of appointees out of the operation of the civil-service law? I have not looked at the question carefully, but that is my impression.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the purpose. That is a Senate amendment, and the committee recommend non-concurrence.

Amendments numbered 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, and 148 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, and 155 were non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 156 was read, increasing the appropriation for the chief clerk and Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs to $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence in that amendment, with the following amendment: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$2,500."

Mr. STORM. I move that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

Mr. Chairman, my motion has precedence, I take it, over the motion of the gentleman from Indiana. That is in accordance with the previous ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled wrongly before, and does not care to do so again. The Chair holds that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is in order.

Mr. STORM. Then I desire to be recognized for the purpose of being heard on this question. As the Senate has amended this provision it stands precisely as it stood when the bill came from the Committee on Appropriations. The point of order was made upon it by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and the Chair sustained the point of order so far as striking out the increase of salary was concerned and overruled it on the question of creating the office.

In other words, the decision said while he could not have the increased compensation he might be permitted to perform the additional labor. The amendment compels the new officer to perform the duties of two offices for $3,000, which in the corresponding grades in the other Departments cost between $5,000 and $6,000.

As I have said, the Senate has now by an amendment restored the bill exactly to the shape it was in when it came from the Committee on Appropriations. This amendment is just and proper. The bill now creates the office of assistant commissioner, and imposes upon the assistant commissioner the additional duty of chief clerk. He is required to perform the duties of both those officers under the designation of assistant commissioner. The salary of the chief clerk now is $2,000. He is to have thrown upon him the additional duties of assistant commissioner. It is proposed to increase the salary $500; it is true——

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that all the other assistants get $3,000?

Mr. STORM. Every one of them. More than that; in the Pension Office the two assistant commissioners get $3,600 each. It is but just that this officer should receive the salary which other assistants receive and which is provided for in this amendment; and I would like to hear some statement or reason why this amendment should not be concurred in. Why should not this officer have this salary of $3,000, inasmuch as he has to perform the duties of both assistant commissioner and chief clerk?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And in the absence of the Commissioner he must necessarily act as Commissioner.

Mr. STORM. Yes; in the absence of the Commissioner he must act as Commissioner. Furthermore, it has been found that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has to discharge the duties of his office in a different manner from that in which the other Commissioners perform their duties. The Commissioner of Pensions, the Commissioner of Public Lands, and the Commissioner of Patents can perform their duties here in their offices in the Department, but it has been found in practice that in order to the proper discharge of the duties of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs he must go into the field and inspect the operations going on there.

In the absence of the Commissioner the office work here must go on. For several months in the year then the assistant commissioner must do his work and assume much graver responsibilities than are imposed on similar officers in the other bureaus. The kind of talent and executive ability required in this officer would in private business command double the salary proposed by the Senate amendment. Any one acquainted with General Upshaw, the present efficient and accomplished chief clerk, will at once agree with me that the salary we propose is small.

This office is as important as any of the corresponding offices in other departments. It now distributes $6,000,000 of appropriations under some four hundred heads and subheads of the appropriation bills. Clearly if any assistant commissioner is charged with important duties it is the assistant commissioner of Indian Affairs; and it passes my comprehension how it was that the Committee on Appropriations, while recognizing the duties to be performed and creating this office, refused to allow the compensation which is given to all other officers of similar grade. I hope the Senate amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the motion of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] will prevail. This officer is to have imposed upon him double duties, more onerous than those of any other assistant commissioner. He is to act both as chief clerk and as assistant commissioner.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will allow me to ask, who has performed the duties of assistant commissioner during the absence of the Commissioner within the last twelve months?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There never has been any assistant commissioner; and the office during the absence of the Commissioner has been left in the hands of a clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. But who performed the duties of the Commissioner at such times?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This clerk performed a part of the duty, but he was never authorized by law to perform the responsible duties contemplated in this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are there any other duties to be performed during the absence of the Commissioner than those which this subordinate has performed?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, there is quite a different class of duties.

Mr. HOLMAN. How did it happen, then, that there was no person there to perform them?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That was a defect in the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. But who actually administered the office during the absence of the Commissioner?

Mr. RYAN. Every official paper had to be signed by the Commissioner, and thus many papers were obliged to await his return before they could be sent out. There was no officer authorized to represent him officially.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, heretofore when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has been compelled to be absent the control of the business of the office has been placed in the hands of a mere clerk—a chief clerk as we term him——

Mr. HOLMAN. And no public interest has suffered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The scope of his authority was so limited that many important matters which ought to have been performed in the absence of the Commissioner were necessarily left undone, for the reason that no officer was invested by law with the authority to perform such duty.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, more than perhaps any other Commissioner in the departments, is required to be absent frequently from his office at Washington. It is important that he should go into the field at times and visit the different Indian agencies. When contracts are being let for supplies to the agencies the Commissioner is obliged to go to New York; and he has performed very valuable service by going there, having been enabled by giving his personal attention to contracts to save the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And the Committee on Indian Affairs has recommended that he shall go into the field.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; as I understand, the Committee on Indian Affairs has recommended that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in order to properly understand the necessities of the Indian service, shall go into the field and examine the condition of the Indians on the reservations and at the different Indian agencies.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it not a fact that the Commissioner is often necessarily away from his office here in Washington from one to three weeks at a time?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have just stated that he is often compelled to be absent for weeks; and under the law as it has existed heretofore the official duties of the position during his absence have been left in the hands of a mere clerk, or chief clerk, as you may term him. But there are certain important, necessary, and responsible duties which can be performed only by the Commissioner or by some one authorized by law to act as deputy or assistant commissioner.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to inquire what necessity exists now which has not existed heretofore for this additional office?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The necessity has existed heretofore. It has at times been very important that there should be an assistant Commissioner, but owing to the failure of the law to provide for such an officer many important duties have during the absence of the Commissioner been left undischarged.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I see that this is the creation of a new office, which I think is in general a movement in the wrong direction.

Mr. STORM. The amendment does not create an additional office.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It does not increase the number of employés. Under this amendment an officer already in office will be required to perform additional duties. Besides discharging the duties he has heretofore performed he will be required to take the place of the Commissioner when that officer is necessarily absent from Washington. It would be gross injustice that this assistant Commissioner should be compelled to do double duty and bear greatly increased responsibilities while restricted to a less salary than any other assistant Commissioner in any of the Departments.

Mr. OATES. Both Houses have concurred in the necessity for such an office, and $3,000 would seem to be a reasonable salary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is very reasonable.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. BURNES having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, stated it had non-concurred in the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2113) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Young, asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on its part Mr. SAWYER, Mr. WHITTHORNE, and Mr. WILSON of Iowa.

It further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1666) granting a pension to Edward Corning, with an amendment, in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of the bill (H. R. 807) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, with amendments, in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House on the bill (H. R. 7087) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the purchase-money on the sale of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. DAWES, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. MAXEY managers of said conference on its part.

It further announced the passage of the bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard, with an amendment, in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of the bill (H. R. 7879) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia, with an amendment, in which concurrence was requested.

A bill (S. 2249) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the Territory of Dakota with certain sums for ordnance and ordnance stores issued to said Territory, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to properly answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan I would be glad to call the attention of the committee to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House in reference to the duties of this office and the increase of this work.

The report says:

The work of this bureau is constantly increasing. The increase in the year 1885 over 1884 was over 30 per cent., and the increase for the first quarter of 1886 over the first quarter of 1885, has been over 33⅓ per cent.; and the increase for the three past months over a similar period in 1884 is about 46 per cent.

And, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to have an extract from the report of Commissioner Atkins read in this connection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the time for debate has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, was recognized, and yielded two and a half minutes to Mr. TOWNSHEND.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That will be sufficient. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk. This is from the report of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Atkins. Those who have served here upon the floor with him will bear testimony that there was not a member in this House who was so anxious or who sought more sedulously to secure honesty and economy in the Departments of the Government than he.

The Clerk read as follows:

As will be seen from what immediately follows, it is my desire to assign to the chief clerk additional important labors. I deem it proper to call attention to the fact that the duties personally devolving upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as the responsible head of the Indian Bureau, are unusually multiform, complicated, and onerous, and to properly discharge them requires much more time and attention than can be given during business hours. The good of the service leads me to suggest that Congress be asked to give this bureau an assistant commissioner, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk. To that officer could then be referred much of the routine work which may be performed equally well by another, but which now involves a large expenditure of time and labor on the part of the Commissioner, and to just that extent lessens his ability to devote his energies to the more important matters which relate to the general administration of Indian affairs.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I hardly think that the gentleman from Illinois is justified when time is of very great value in occupying the attention of the committee in reading a report with which of course every gentleman is familiar.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I believe, Mr. Chairman, I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I yielded two and a half minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman then immediately after the gentleman from Indiana concludes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only rose to say a few words before asking for a vote. I am surprised at the action of the gentleman from Illinois. The Committee on Appropriations considered this subject and have recommended that the salary of this officer be fixed at $2,500 a year, which is an increase of $500 over his present salary. No gentleman is deceived about this matter.

The Indian Office is admirably administered, and its chief is one of the most upright, reliable, and efficient officers of the Government. The office is well conducted in every respect. But the duties which will devolve upon the assistant commissioner are substantially just the same as the chief clerk has hitherto performed and is now performing. An increase of salary of $1,000 would be a very unusual——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not excessive at all, but it would simply equalize his salary with that of others performing the same duties, or less work in fact, and who are getting $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would be an unusual increase. You have not increased any salary as much as $1,000. In fact as a rule there have been no increases. You have provided salaries for the officer in charge of the Bureau of Labor and some others in excess of the average, and for adjusting private land claims in New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado there were salaries provided for in excess of the usual salaries, but those are all the striking instances; but I do hope that this side of the House will adhere to the pledges made to the country against increases of salaries beyond a reasonable limit. An increase of $500, making the salary $2,500, might perhaps be reasonable and justifiable; that is the judgment of your Committee on Appropriations, who have examined the subject carefully; and I trust that a large increase like this $1,000 to an officer who is now getting the usual salary of $2,000 for clerk of a bureau will not be made.

Mr. STORM. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana whether or not the original bill did not provide a salary of $3,000?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; the committee at one time had such an opinion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask the gentleman if he would not consider it unjust to limit this officer's salary to $2,500 when we pay $3,000 to other persons performing the same duties or less? This officer has really more duties to perform for the reason that the others have chief clerks.

Mr. HOLMAN. But there is some regard to be had to the character and responsibilities of the duties to be performed. While it is true that the assistant commissioner of Indian affairs holds a very important position, it of course is not up to the proportions of the Land Office, where the Commissioner receives $4,000 and $3,000 is paid to the assistant commissioner. I admit the salaries of the Land Office are not ample, as it is the great bureau of the Departments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And he has no more laborious duties to perform than the assistant commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is not so important a position at that salary in the Government.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand the gentleman to say that the duties will remain substantially the same as they are now performed by this official?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir. Substantially the same according to my understanding of the office.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is not an increase of salary, it is the creation of a new office and a provision for a reasonable salary. That is all it is. You impose new duties upon the gentleman who now acts as chief clerk and say he shall be assistant commissioner of Indian Affairs, and then the question arises what is a reasonable compensation? Now, sir, there are in the Interior Department the Commissioners of Indian Affairs, of Patents, of Pensions, and of the Land Office. They are all of equal rank, and certainly this bureau is of just as much importance as any other of them; a great deal more than some, I think, and it has a less force of employés than any one of the other Commissioners. I can see no good reason for making a distinction in any one of these salaries, all of which are low enough now. But, I repeat, this is not a question of increase of salary but the fixing of a salary of a new office created by the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOLMAN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 41) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road;

An act (H. R. 392) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads;

An act (H. R. 5874) to provide for the taxation of railroad-grant lands, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 2148) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a building for the use of the United States circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, and other Government offices at Williamsport, Pa.," and making an additional appropriation therefor;

An act (H. R. 4498) authorizing an additional appropriation of $25,000 for the court-house at Keokuk, Iowa, to make the same fire-proof;

An act (H. R. 5862) providing for the establishment of certain light-houses and fog-signals, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. 985) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes, and granting to the city of Marquette, Mich., certain lands for park purposes.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. BURNES. The history of this item of appropriation may be interesting. In order that it may be known to this Committee of the Whole House I invite special attention to it. When the original bill was reported by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana to the House it contained a provision precisely similar to the Senate amendment now before us. The Committee on Appropriations then thought that $3,000 was the proper salary for the assistant commissioner of Indian Affairs, and so the gentleman from Indiana reported in the bill. It was the deliberate judgment of the Committee on Appropriations. It was the free, voluntary offering of the committee.

When the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole the item was ruled out on a point of order and the Indian Department was left without any assistant commissioner. Considered in the Senate, the item was restored and comes back to us as an amendment of that body in the precise words, I believe, originally adopted by the House Committee on Appropriations and reported to the House as stated.

The assistant commissioner of Public Lands has a salary of $3,000; and the original bill reported to the House contained an increase of such salary to $3,250, with a chief clerk at a salary of $2,250. The assistant commissioner of Patents has a salary of $3,000, with a chief clerk at $2,250. There are two assistant commissioners of Pensions, each of whom receive $3,600, with two chief clerks, one at $2,500 and the other at $2,000.

The assistant commissioner of Indian Affairs is allowed no chief clerk. He performs all the duties of that office; all the duties of a chief clerk and nearly half the time the office duties of the Commissioner, who is required, necessarily, to visit Indian tribes and ascertain personally their condition and necessities. Why this inequality? It is admitted that this is one of the most important bureaus of the Government. Its distinguished head has made an honorable fame throughout the Republic, and surely his assistant commissioner should be as justly and liberally provided for as other officers of like grade. I am not an advocate of increased salaries, but I am of equality and justice.

There was a special Committee on Indian Affairs which went over the Western country last summer. They saw the necessity for this assistant commissionership and, if I mistake not, recommended its creation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BURNES. The Committee on Indian Affairs recommended it, I know, and I have before me their report upon the subject. My honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], in reporting the original bill establishing this office and fixing its salary at $3,000, must be held as committed to the propriety of both.

May I not, Mr. Chairman, with appropriate curiosity, inquire why my distinguished friend in charge of the bill now resists the Senate amendment, which is but an indorsement of the action of himself and the Committee on Appropriations? What new light has he had on the subject since he reported the original bill? Why was this salary placed at $3,000 a month or so ago, and, indorsed by the Senate, is now regarded as $500 too high?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURNES. The distinguished gentleman must please pardon me. A moment ago he would not yield to me. Why should the indorsement of the Senate make us distrust our own original judgment? I can not believe that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana has taken fright by reason of such indorsement of his original provision.

Personally I care nothing about this matter, and have but a slight personal acquaintance with the gentleman upon whom the duties of this new position are likely to fall, but I am quite sure he is entitled to and will receive justice and equality of compensation with other officials of the same rank and service. The fact that he is a Tennesseean will not be regarded by this committee as sufficient justification for an inadequate or inferior salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the statement of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] is a little unfair. The gentleman ought be aware I never favored the increase of this salary to $3,000. I consented to an increase to $2,500. It is not a proper thing for him or myself to refer to what transpired in the Committee on Appropriations; and yet he says because I reported the bill containing that provision I was in favor of it.

I appreciate the young gentleman who fills this position of chief clerk of the Indian Office as an active, efficient, and faithful public officer, and I should not have objected to $2,500, as I understood it to be fixed in the first instance, and as I think other members of the committee understood it. The gentleman from Missouri talks about the salary being reduced from $3,000 to $2,500. It is simply a proposed increase from $2,000 to $3,000. If the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] can find the creation of new offices and this increase of salaries in harmony with the pledges made by their friends, if not by themselves, all over the country two years ago, it is something I can not comprehend. It is not in conformity, as I understand, with the pledges on which these seats on this side of the House were filled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will ask my friend if, when he becomes satisfied that the duties of an office have so greatly increased that there must be an additional officer to efficiently perform them, is not the public service benefited by the creation of such an office?

Mr. HOLMAN. The duties are as they have been heretofore. The Indian Office has always been an interesting one.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Oh, no. The report I read shows they have increased 50 per cent.

Mr. WILSON. Before the vote is taken I wish to call attention to a remark of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which is not perhaps up to his usual standard of fairness. I do not suggest that he has intentionally deviated from that standard. But when he said he understood the committee originally fixed this salary at $2,500 and added that that was the understanding of other members of the committee, I must say that I do not think that was fair to other members of the committee and to the clerk who keeps the records, in whom the committee have absolute confidence. I think the other members of the committee will bear me out in the statement that the amount of $3,000, as originally reported by the gentleman in charge of the bill, was the amount originally agreed on.

Mr. HOLMAN. My understanding was that it was fixed at $2,500; such was the opinion of at least one other member of the committee. But by no possibility could anything I said as to that be construed as throwing a shade of doubt on the correctness of the records of the committee.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 88.

So the motion to concur with an amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STORM. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Amendment numbered 157 was concurred in.

Amendments numbered 158, 159, 160, 161, and 162 were read together, and were non-concurred in.

The amendment 163 was read, raising the appropriation for compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions to $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to recommend concurrence in that amendment. It relates to the compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions. The salary was fixed by the action of the House at $4,000, but the original recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations was $5,000. The Senate has increased the amount from four to five thousand dollars, as originally recommended by the committee, and the committee now recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I have not behind me, in my opposition to this amendment, the report of any committee, but I have behind me, in justification of the position which I take, certain facts which I think, if understood, may lead others to the idea that they ought not to concur in this amendment.

The first proposition I make against concurrence is that the provision is squarely in contravention of a distinct statute law. That may not have any particular bearing upon the subject in the minds of some gentlemen, but my next proposition is that being in contravention of law it is also in conflict with Rule XXI of this House, because it is in conflict with the law. The third objection that I make to concurring in this amendment is that other like officers, the other Commissioners, do not get this salary. The Commissioner of Patents does not get so much; the Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not get so much; the Commissioner of the Land Office does not get it; the Commissioner of Education does not get it; the Commissioner of Labor does not get it; the Commissioner of Railroads does not get it; the Commissioner of Agriculture does not get it. Now, I can not for the life of me see the propriety of violating the statute law and violating the rules of this House for the sake of placing this particular man's salary a thousand dollars higher than the law permits it to be, thus making a discrimination in his favor as against all these other officers. It is not necessary for me to prove to this House that he is not so good an officer as the others; but even upon the assumption that they are all equally good officers, and that their duties are equally onerous and equally well performed, it seems to me that there can be no good reason urged why an exception should be made in favor of this one unless, indeed, it be that gentlemen having much business to do in that office may find it more convenient to be friends than enemies of the Commissioner. But in the face of the additional fact that this officer in his last report told us that human ingenuity had been exhausted in that office to prevent the allowance of pension claims, I do not see why he should be rewarded with a thousand dollars extra salary in violation of law and in violation of the rules of this House.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to say a word about this matter in connection with the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to concur in the Senate amendment. As that gentleman has stated, when this bill was first reported to the House the salary recommended for the Commissioner of Pensions was $5,000. Upon a point of order made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] it was cut down to $4,000, because that was the amount of the salary fixed by the Revised Statutes. Some three or four years ago, however, there was an appropriation of $5,000 made for the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, and it has been kept at that figure from that time to this.

Now I want to say that, notwithstanding the fact that this salary is fixed by the Revised Statutes at $4,000, I believe that a man who is competent to fill that great office ought to receive $5,000 a year. It may be alleged that the present Commissioner of Pensions has not pleased all of us in the performance of his duties, and I will frankly say that he has not always pleased me, though perhaps he has pleased other gentlemen. But without reference to that question, the office itself, in view of the great responsibility which it imposes, is entitled to a salary of $5,000 a year.

Upon the same principle we might consider the salaries of the other officers of the Government, commencing with the Chief Executive of the nation and coming down. I think the President of the United States ought to receive $50,000 a year, although I am frank to say that if I were to consider that question from a personal point of view, with special reference to the present Executive, I might claim that he did not earn $50,000 because of his many sins of omission and commission. But, on the other hand, his acts may meet the approval of other gentlemen, and, without reference to that question, I hold that the Chief Executive of the United States ought to have a salary of $50,000 a year.

So I might run down from one office of the Government to another. Many of the incumbents of those offices in their action do not accord with my idea of what such officers should be, and do not perform their duties as I think they ought to perform them, but I would have the salaries in proportion to the importance and responsibility of the offices, and then, if the incumbents of those offices do not perform their duties as the majority of the people think they ought to perform them, by and by the people will have a chance to be heard, and they will be turned out and others will be chosen who will perform the duties better. From this standpoint, sir, I think it is entirely proper that the office of Commissioner of Pensions should command a salary of $5,000 a year.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say that this salary was fixed by law at $4,000.

Mr. CANNON. The Revised Statutes fix it at $4,000, but since 1881 we have been appropriating at the rate of $5,000.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, if it is proper to make an appropriation of $5,000 to pay a salary fixed by law at $4,000, why would it not be equally proper to make an appropriation of $6,000 apiece to pay the $5,000 salary of each member of this House? In other words, if you begin this where are you going to stop? I do not think this salary is any too high for the Commissioner of Pensions, but I think we ought to amend the general law.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that since 1881 we have appropriated $5,000 per annum for the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Because we have done wrong for four or five years we are to do wrong indefinitely.

Mr. CANNON. I will say further that the Democratic majority here by many actions touching these appropriations have virtually confessed that all the pretenses they made in the Forty-fourth, the Forty-fifth, and the Forty-sixth Congresses in regard to economy and the reduction of salaries was mere "leather and prunella," mere sham and shoddy.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, we are here yet.

Mr. CANNON. Those same gentlemen come here now and increase a number of salaries and create a number of new offices.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Without any reference to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the salaries of other Commissioners, I think the Committee of the Whole will concur with me in the statement that the gentleman who now occupies the office of Commissioner of Pensions is entitled to a salary of $5,000 a year. During the last fiscal year the amount of money that passed through that office was $65,000,000. The number of certificates allowed——

Mr. DINGLEY. No money passes through that office.

Mr. PRICE. How much money does the Commissioner of Pensions handle?

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, the money is paid out upon the findings of the office of which he is the head; and if he handles not one cent——

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is not the money to pay pensions transmitted directly from the Treasury Department to the pension agencies?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is. But I am speaking of the responsibility which attaches to an office the decisions of which involve so large an amount of money.

Mr. PRICE rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. During the time the present Commissioner has been in office he has allowed original and increased applications for pensions to the number of one hundred and ten thousand, involving many millions of dollars. Now the business of the Pension Bureau imposes upon its head a vast amount of responsible and exacting labor. I think that a salary of $5,000 is little enough.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him——

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise, the object being that we may extend the hour for adjournment.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the House is fully impressed with the necessity of completing this bill at the earliest moment in the hope that it may become a law by the 15th instant. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House continue its session after 5 o'clock until the bill is completed—not as to a final vote, but as to the consideration of the Senate amendments.

Mr. RYAN. Why not have the final vote this afternoon?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will modify my motion and ask that the session continue till the bill be closed up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the hour of adjournment be postponed to-day until the completion of the consideration of the Senate amendments to this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. In Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. In the House also, as the Chair understands. Is there objection?

Mr. STRAIT. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Minnesota insists on his objection I shall ask the House at a suitable time to take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. STRAIT. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection, the order requested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BLOUNT in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8974) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope, Mr. Chairman, we shall now have a vote.

Mr. PRICE. I hope we shall not proceed to vote until we understand a little more fully the circumstances surrounding this vexed question. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has undertaken to impress upon us the importance of raising this salary, because of the immense amount of money which, as he stated, passes through the hands of this officer. I tried at that point to ask him the question whether this officer gives any bond at all, whether he handles a dollar of money. But the gentleman would not give me an opportunity to put that question. Now, I assert that the Commissioner of Pensions gives no bond, handles no money, is responsible for no expenditure——

Mr. SPRINGER. I so stated.

Mr. PRICE. I did not hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I so stated in answer to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. PRICE. Then, how does the amount of money expended by that Department cut any figure when we are determining the compensation this officer should receive, if he is under no bonds, handles no money, and is not under any financial responsibility?

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman will pardon me. He did not yield to me, and I must in this case pay him back in his own coin, although he is a genial gentleman whom I am ordinarily glad to oblige.

Mr. SPRINGER. Never mind compliments.

Mr. PRICE. When the gentleman speaks of the present Commissioner as more efficient than any other officer who ever occupied that position I dissent from that conclusion, and I wish to state the facts in justification of my dissent. When he took that office there were about five thousand claims passed up for final adjudication which had been examined, all the labor of which had been done except the final review by his predecessor. He took from his examiners a large force and put it on the review board, causing the business to be retarded in the other departments. To the reorganization of his force much of the success of the admission of claims is attributable.

But another circumstance should not be forgotten. Up to that moment no case was ever briefed without having the name, number, post-office address, and time of filing, and also a brief of every paper filed in the case. That was charged to merely making a face brief, in which no reference at all is made to the papers in the case. That is the idea and the result of the brain of another man, an employé.

So that when you take the efficiency of the man, in the face of the declaration he has exhausted his ingenuity to prevent the passage of claims, you must not bring this in here as an inducement to me to give him a thousand dollars more than the law allows and more than is given to the head of any other bureau in this entire Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the debate will close.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I trust the debate will not be complicated with the manner in which the present officer has administered the duties of that office. I submit any fair-minded member, if he will contemplate the amount of work performed by the Commissioner of Pensions, I do not care who fills the office—if he will consider the great responsibility and the vast amount of labor required to be done will admit the Commissioner of Pensions ought to receive at least $5,000 a year.

I wish to correct an error into which my friend from Wisconsin has fallen. He seems to think we are here attempting to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions. There is no increase over what has been paid preceding Commissioners.

Mr. PRICE. Above the law, it is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is to give to the present Commissioner of Pensions what was given to the Commissioner of Pensions last year, and preceding years.

Mr. PRICE. It was never given until 1881.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It has been given to every Commissioner of Pensions since then.

Mr. PRICE. In violation of law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The duties of that office have been constantly increasing. It has been given to Mr. Dudley, who was the preceding Commissioner.

Mr. PRICE. In violation of law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No it was not in violation of law.

Mr. RYAN. We make laws here.

Mr. PRICE. It was in violation of law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The appropriation bills fixed the salary at $5,000. I know the former Commissioner of Pensions, Dudley, received a salary of $5,000. [Cries of "Vote!"] The salary was increased in view of the increased duties. Commissioner Dudley was compelled to take home with him at night papers in cases to keep up the work of the Department. [Cries of "Vote!"] I know General Black has been forced to do likewise and labor long after office hours. We only propose to give him what has been given for five years to the Commissioner of Pensions. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Lest there might be some misunderstanding as to the inquiry put to me I wish to say one word: that any man who is fit to be Commissioner of Pensions is fit to be a member of Congress, and that any man fit to be a member of Congress is worth $5,000 a year. But I think we ought to begin first by changing the law, and thus making the appropriation in accordance with the law.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that amendments numbered 164 and 165 be considered together.

Mr. PRICE. I rise to a question of order. Has the vote been taken on this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. PRICE. I did not hear it, and would like to have it taken over again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair submitted the question distinctly and the committee acted upon it.

Mr. PRICE. Not so distinctly that we could hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must direct the Clerk to proceed with the reading.

Mr. PRICE. Well, I guess you can get it through under the gag law without raising a row.

Amendments numbered 164 and 165 were non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 166 was concurred in.

Amendment numbered 179 was read, as follows:

To enable the Commissioner of Labor to collect and report to Congress the statistics of and relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and Territories and in the District of Columbia, $10,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to concur in that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations thought that subject ought to go to a committee of conference, and therefore recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter and should be settled by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a doubt in the mind of the committee as to whether it properly belongs to that field of inquiry or not, and therefore we have recommended non-concurrence for the purpose of examining the question.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the House will concur in so important an amendment as that.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. We ought to concur by all means.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 75.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 180 and 181 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 182, 183, 184, 185, and 186 were concurred in.

Amendments numbered 187 and 188 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 189, 190, 191, and 192 were concurred in.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask what reason there is why these surveys in Arizona and California have been cut down so much. This amendment of the Senate numbered 189 strikes out "$2,000" and inserts "$1,000," and the amendment numbered 191 strikes out "$15,000" and inserts "$5,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. It results from the fact, as the gentleman is aware, that the House, and the Senate also it seems, have reached the conclusion that it is not necessary this year to appropriate any considerable sum of money for this service, since there is but little business being done in the surveyors' offices and little will be done during the coming year. I think in the sundry civil bill we appropriated about $50,000 for resurveys.

Mr. RYAN. The Senate concurs in the opinion of the House in that regard.

Amendments numbered 193 and 194 were concurred in.

Amendments numbered 195 and 196 were non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 197 was concurred in.

Amendments numbered 198 and 199 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 200 to 209, inclusive, except amendment number 207, were concurred in.

Amendment numbered 207 was read, as follows:

Strike out "eleven" and insert "four;" so that it will read "$4,800."

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I wish to move non-concurrence in the amendment in order to restore the figure which was incorporated by the House in the bill. I want to state, sir, that the House appropriated $11,800 for this purpose. The appropriation last year was $15,300, and the Senate has now cut it down to $4,800. From the best information I can obtain this latter named sum is entirely inadequate to carry out the duties of that office. General Sparks telegraphs me, the present Commissioner of the General Land Office:

The total area of public lands remaining unsurveyed up to June 30, 1885, is 1,663,223 acres.

Mr. RYAN. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the House refused to make any appropriation to survey the public lands for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is nothing to do in that office now.

Mr. KING. Well, I think it is wrong. I think there should be means provided for carrying on the office as contemplated by the policy that has been always practiced hitherto.

Mr. HOLMAN. But if there is no work to be done there is no necessity for keeping up a body of clerks.

Mr. KING. I would like the gentleman to explain why there should be an office if there is no work to do. The gentleman is an economist, and if there is an office without work, why not abolish the office entirely?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what we propose to do next winter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We have abolished nearly all of them.

Mr. KING. I think you are inflicting a great injustice on the public service in this instance, and I hope the House will sustain me.

Amendment 207 was concurred in.

Amendments 210, 211, and 212 were non-concurred in.

Amendments 213 and 214 were read, as follows:

In line 2448 strike out "$7,000" and insert "$3,000."
In line 2449 strike out "$9,500" and insert "$5,500;" so that it would read: "For surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $3,000; in all, $5,500."

The committee recommended concurrence.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to know if there is any special reason for the reduction of the appropriation for clerks from $7,000 to $3,000 in the office of the surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico. It seems to me in that great Territory, which is twice as large in area as the State of Illinois, and the business of that office having been behind for some time, the amount for clerk-hire originally in the bill will be required to finish up the unfinished business of that office in the coming year. I think it is a very great risk to take to cut down that service more than one-half. I hope we will non-concur, and that this will go to a conference, that the matter may be investigated. Inquiry should be made either by the committee or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office of Mr. Julian, who is at the head of that office, and I would be ready to agree to what a man of his character would state as to the requirements of his office. I think he ought to be consulted as to whether he can discharge the duties of his office on this great reduction.

The amendments were concurred in.

Amendment 215 was non-concurred in.

Amendment 216 was concurred in.

Amendment 217 was non-concurred in.

Amendments 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, and 223 were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend concurrence in all these amendments.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I request that amendments 220 and 221 be omitted from this vote.

The amendments just read, except 220 and 221, were concurred in.

The excepted amendments, 220 and 221, were as follows:

In line 2472 strike out "$6,000" and insert "$3,000;" in line 2473 strike out "$8,500" and insert "$5,500;" so that it would read:

"For surveyor-general of the Territory of Washington, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $3,000; in all, $5,500."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I happen to know something about the business of the office of the surveyor-general of Washington Territory, being intimately connected with those who are in office there; and I know that the field-notes of the past year have not been worked up. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, who perhaps has not this information, that there is a full year's work on hand to be done. I would suggest to him that we non-concur in order to maintain liberty of action.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the suggestion made as to the extent to which the field-notes are behind, I have no objection to this going to the conference.

The amendments 220 and 221 were non-concurred in.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to return to the Senate amendments relating to the office of surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico, for the purpose of moving non-concurrence for the same reason that the amendments relating to Washington Territory have just been non-concurred in. I think there should be an opportunity for a further investigation of this matter.

Objection was made.

Amendments 224 and 225 were concurred in.

Amendments 226, 227, 228, 229, and 230 were non-concurred in.

Amendment 231 was concurred in.

Amendment 232 was non-concurred in.

Amendment 233 was read, as follows:

For postage required to prepay matter addressed to Postal Union countries, $100.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am instructed to move to concur with the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 79, after line 23, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

"For the following additional force rendered necessary under the provisions of the act of January 20, 1885, providing for the ascertainment of the claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to July 31, 1801, namely, two law clerks at $2,000 each, and one stenographer at $1,600, to be employed for one year, to be appointed by the Attorney-General; in all, $5,600."

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana what that has to do with an appropriation for postage to Postal Union countries?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is put in as a new paragraph. It is an independent paragraph.

Mr. SPRINGER. But you have no right to attach an independent paragraph to the bill at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois raise the question of order?

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it moved as an amendment to the Senate amendment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. From conversations I have had at the Department I am satisfied that this is absolutely necessary. I hope no point will be made upon it.

The Senate amendment 233 was concurred in with the proposed amendment.

Amendment 234 was concurred in.

Strike out the following:

"For salaries of the district judges of the United States for California, the northern district of Illinois, the eastern district of Louisiana, Massachusetts, Maryland, New York, New Jersey, the southern district of Ohio, and for Pennsylvania, twelve in all, at $4,000 each, $48,000.

"For salaries of the district judges of the United States for Alabama, Arkansas, Connecticut, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, the southern district of Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Kansas, the western district of Louisiana, Maine, Missouri, Mississippi, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, the northern district of Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin, forty-four in all, at $3,500 each, $154,000,"

And insert:

"For salaries of the fifty-six district judges of the United States, $203,500."

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. MORROW. I move to concur. The paragraph proposed to be stricken out made a reduction of $1,000 on the salary of the district judge for the State of California, and a reduction of $500 on the salary of some other judge whose district I can not ascertain by merely looking at the bill.

But there is a reduction of $1,000 in the House bill restored by the Senate amendment. Now, the law provides that the salary of the district judge for California shall be $5,000, and this appropriation bill proposes to give him $4,000. In other words, it reduces his salary $1,000, and compels him to go to the Court of Claims to get the balance. The Senate amendment, however, brings up the salary to the amount at which it is fixed by law, and for that reason I propose that the House concur in the amendment.

When this matter was under discussion the other day in the House, it was suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the salaries of various officers in California had been adjusted at a time when living expenses were very high there, and that the time had now come when those salaries should be cut down. But the committee should remember that for years and years the salary of the district judge of California was paid to him in greenbacks when the currency of the Pacific coast was gold coin. The result of that was that for many years the district judge of California received only something like $2,000 or $2,500 annually for his services. However, he had a life position, and he had the assurance of the law that he would receive $5,000 a year, and he went on and performed his duties honorably and satisfactorily, and no judge stands higher than Judge Hoffman in that respect.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman from California if the Constitution does not provide that the compensation of judges shall not be diminished during their continuance in office?

Mr. MORROW. I was about to allude to that. As gentlemen know, there is a constitutional provision, just cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], which prohibits a reduction in the salaries of United States judges during their term of office. Of course I understand the proposition here is that this is an appropriation bill, and that it does not change the legal salary, but simply appropriates a thousand dollars less for the payment of the salary; but the effect of it will be that, if the judge does not go to the Court of Claims, this appropriation bill will absolutely change his salary. Such legislation is wrong in itself, and furthermore it is small business, which ought not to be entered upon by the House of Representatives of the United States.

Another point. The judicial salaries in California have been recently reviewed by the convention which adopted our new constitution. That body considered this whole matter of the proper salaries for the judges, and the result was that that convention, which was in favor of cutting down salaries generally, determined that our supreme court judges should have $6,000 a year. That is the result of a recent revision by the new constitutional convention in California. Now, if the judges of the supreme court of the State ought to receive $6,000 a year, certainly $5,000 is not too large a salary for the district judge, having jurisdiction over the whole State.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, upon the ground of merit, upon the ground of law, upon the ground of the Constitution of the United States, I hold that the Senate amendment ought to be concurred in.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does the Senate amendment appropriate the amount of the salary fixed by the statute law?

Mr. MORROW. It does.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from California whether this office was not created at this session of Congress?

Mr. MORROW. No, sir. The office has not been created by this Congress. This House has passed a bill providing a district judge for the southern district of California, but that bill has not passed the Senate, and no one can tell what will be its fate. This appropriation is for the district judge of California, who is now Judge Hoffman.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does that judge receive his salary under a special law?

Mr. MORROW. I do not understand that he does.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the amount of the salary fixed by law?

Mr. MORROW. Five thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is that salary fixed by the general law, or have we simply appropriated that much for the salary in the annual appropriation bills?

Mr. MORROW. I think it is fixed by a general law. The judge has held this office for over thirty years.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the judge is receiving his salary under a general law, I admit that we can not reduce it.

Mr. MORROW. He is, and that is the point.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. MORROW to concur in the Senate amendment, and it was lost—ayes 53, noes 55.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 236 and 237 were non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 238 and 239 were concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8974) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, with the Senate amendments thereto, and had directed him to report them back to the House with sundry recommendations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think it was agreed that there should be a separate vote in the House on certain propositions.

Mr. REAGAN. A separate vote is to be taken on amendment No. 38.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there was a similar understanding in regard to the record in the Fitz-John Porter case. I now move the previous question on the amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. PRICE. I desire a separate vote on amendment No. 163.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first put the question on ordering the previous question, after which any gentleman will have the right to demand a separate vote on any amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that as to all amendments on which a separate vote is not requested the action of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will now indicate any amendments on which they desire separate votes.

Mr. PRICE. I ask for a separate vote on amendment No. 163, increasing the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for a separate vote on amendment No. 28, on page 14, the amendment inserting the names of "A. H. Pickens and H. T. Lyle."

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I ask for a separate vote on amendment No. 179.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It was understood there should be a separate vote on amendment No. 119. That was the agreement in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to call for a separate vote on any amendment without regard to any agreement.

If there be no objection the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will be concurred in as to all amendments of the Senate except those on which a separate vote has been asked.

There was no objection.

Amendment numbered 28 (on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. REAGAN) was read, as follows:

After the words "two chief pages," in line 326, insert "A. H. Pickens and H. T. Lyle."

The SPEAKER The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports in favor of concurring in this amendment. The question will be taken on concurrence.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 66, noes 61.

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered: and Mr. REAGAN and Mr. BUTTERWORTH were appointed.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 31, noes 99; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill (H. R. 1840) granting a pension to Samuel F. Garnett; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. BRUMM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 89, noes 44; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 13, 1886.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents proceedings and resolutions of a convention of Republican editors of the State of Ohio, held in the city of Columbus, July 8, 1886, praying for an investigation of charges in respect to the election of Hon. H. B. PAYNE as Senator from that State; also a petition of officers and members of the Republican executive committee of Crawford County, Ohio, making the same prayer; also a petition of 16 citizens of Shane's Crossing, Mercer County, Ohio, making the same prayer. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Privilèges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented five petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES presented six petitions of citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of certain bills in relation to the public lands, Presidential and Congressional elections, and the disbursement of a part of the Treasury surplus; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of the American Humane Association, praying for certain legislation in regard to the transportation of live-stock; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of Harris & Matthews and 7 other dealers, of Negaunee, Marquette County, Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of the proposed oleomargarine law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no "concurrent or other resolutions" the morning business is closed, and the Calendar under the special order of July 7 is now in order. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 2207) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868," was announced as first in order.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask leave to present a petition at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Again the Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the rule.

Mr. GEORGE. I had the petition in my desk at the time petitions were called and overlooked it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again call the attention of the Senate to the special rule under which the Senate is acting. There being but two days left for the operation of this special rule, the Chair feels bound to enforce the rule strictly hereafter, because the time is taken from the Calendar. The Senator from Mississippi will have an opportunity to present the petition at half past 12 o'clock.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

ILLEGAL TONNAGE DUES.

Mr. SPOONER. Order of Business 1228, being Senate bill 1651, was yesterday passed over informally. Does not that come up now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if the Senator calls it up. It is subject to call.

Mr. SPOONER. It was passed over informally, and I supposed that it would be first in order in the call of the Calendar this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill is passed over informally it is not laid before the Senate until called up.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that that bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 1651) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage dues.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

Mr. FRYE. It is a very long report.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the Senator from Wisconsin be allowed to make a statement first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. I withdraw the call for the reading of the report at present, so that the Senator from Wisconsin may be heard.

Mr. SPOONER. This bill was reported by me by direction of the Committee on Claims. The committee adopted the report made upon a similar bill in the House of Representatives some time ago. It is very long, and I think I can state to the Senate in a very few moments the substance of the proposition.

By the ninth article of the treaty of 1827 between the United States and the Hanseatic Republic this was provided:

The contracting parties, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations in respect of commerce and navigation which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

This, as will be observed by the Senate, is the ordinary "favored-nation clause" of our treaties. This treaty is still in force. Subsequently, in 1858, a treaty was made by the United States with Belgium which contained this provision:

Steam vessels of the United States and Belgium engaged in regular navigation between the United States and Belgium shall be exempt in both countries from the payment of duties of tonnage, anchorage, buoys, and light-houses.

Under the former treaty, this treaty with Belgium, exempting Belgian steamers from the payment of anchorage and tonnage dues, became applicable to steamers of the Hanseatic Republic, and for thirty years prior to 1860 those steamers had paid no tonnage dues to the United States. Shortly after the war broke out Congress passed this act—

That upon all ships, vessels, or steamers, which, after the 31st day of December, 1862, shall be entered at any custom-house in the United States, whether ships or vessels of the United States or belonging wholly or in part to subjects of foreign powers, there shall be paid a tax or tonnage duty of 10 cents per ton of the measurement of said vessel in addition to any tonnage duty now imposed by law—

With this proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed in any wise to impair any rights and privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation under the laws and treaties of the United States relative to the duty on tonnage of vessels.

Nothing would seem plainer than that under this exception the steamship companies of the Hanseatic Republic were excepted and intended to be excepted. The Secretary of the Treasury, without causing an examination of the various treaties to be made, applied this law to all vessels. The result was that from the passage of the law tonnage dues were exacted in contravention of the treaty from the ships belonging to these companies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did they not pay under protest and sue to recover?

Mr. SPOONER. They did not know until some years after they began making the payments of this Belgian treaty and its provisions. Later, after the Attorney-General of the United States had twice decided that this money was exacted in contravention of treaty, Congress passed an act providing for its refund, and it was refunded. This bill is to pay interest.

Mr. FRYE. The whole amount of the principal was refunded?

Mr. SPOONER. The whole amount of the principal was refunded. This bill is to pay interest at 6 per cent. upon the moneys which all agree, including Congress, had been exacted in contravention of our treaty obligation from these companies. The report sets forth a great many instances in which the Government of the United States has exacted interest from foreign nations and has paid interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's five minutes' time is out under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall have to object to the bill. It involves very important considerations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule. The next case will be reported.

MEXICAN TREATY AWARDS.

The bill (S. 2207) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868," was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a disputed matter. It is useless to try to attend to it under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM B. THAYER AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 559) for the relief of George F. Roberts, administrator of the estate of William B. Thayer, deceased, surviving partner of Thayer Brothers, and others, was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Claims, May 26, 1886.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

R. G. HUSTON & CO.

The bill (S. 2529) for the relief of R. G. Huston & Co. was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay R. G. Huston and John B. Neely, partners as R. G. Huston & Co., the sum of $7,572.48, for replacing earth and material washed away from the levees from Milton to Raleigh, in the State of Louisiana, by the extraordinary floods of February, 1883, the same being in full payment for all extra work done by them in connection with their contract with the United States under date of October 3, 1882; and said sum is hereby appropriated to the payment of the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FAIR May 26, 1866:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 749) for the relief of R. G. Huston & Co., having considered the same, submit the following report:

The facts in this case are fairly stated in House Report No. 2008, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, made by the House Committee on Claims, a portion of which is as follows:

"The facts are that in September, 1882, the Government advertised for proposals for the construction of the Wilton and Raleigh and other levees on the Mississippi River. On the 25th of September, 1882, Messrs. R. G. Huston & Co. submitted their proposal for the work on said levee, and the contract was awarded them on the 3d day of October following. Notice of the approval of this contract was not sent to Messrs. Huston & Co. until the 9th day of November, 1882, and did not reach them until the 24th of the same month.

"This delay in giving notice to the contractors prevented the commencement of their operations for at least six weeks.

"Immediately upon receiving the notice, Messrs. R. G. Huston & Co. proceeded with the work, employing a large number of men and teams, and continued to prosecute it with diligence and energy and to the entire satisfaction of the Government engineers in charge. During the month of February, 1883, and while a portion of the work was yet unfinished, a sudden and very extraordinary rise of the Mississippi River took place, threatening the destruction of the completed and uncompleted work, whereupon the Government engineer in charge directed Messrs. Huston & Co. to erect certain protection levees, intended to secure not only the uncompleted work, but especially the Government work which had been already completed and paid for, which they immediately did, and for that purpose necessarily drew off their force from the levee then in process of construction by them. While the contractors were engaged in erecting the protection levees, the river rose so rapidly as to sweep away portions of the protection levee and also of the main levee which had not been completed, and for the portion of the main levee so swept away, and which the contractors were compelled to rebuild, they asked payment at the same rate as for the rest of the work."

This bill was referred to Senator Jackson at this session as subcommittee of the Committee on Claims, but he did not report it to the full committee before his resignation. At that time he returned the bill and accompanying papers to the committee-room, and among the papers was a draught of a report on the case, prepared by him, which your committee adopt, together with its recommendations.

Mr. Jackson's report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred S. 749, entitled "A bill for the relief of R. G. Huston & Co.," having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

The essential facts of this case are set out in the following letter from W. L. Marshall, captain of engineers, and written in reply to a request for information sent him by the War Department:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER'S OFFICE,
Vicksburg, Miss., March 31, 1884.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report concerning the bill for relief of R. G. Huston & Co. (H. R. 4233). As stated therein, a contract approved by the honorable Secretary of War was made between myself, on the part of the United States, and R. G. Huston & Co., for the construction of the Wilton and Raleigh levee, Louisiana.

This contract is dated October 3, 1882. Under this contract the work was vigorously prosecuted by the contractors until February, 1883, when the work was interrupted by the flood in the Mississippi River, which, in spite of the active efforts of the contractors, broke through the "protection levee" then in process of construction, and washed away 31,552 cubic yards of material which had been placed by the contractors. After the subsidence of the flood this material was replaced by the contractors, under their contract, without pay therefor, the work satisfactorily completed, and a final estimate paid January 11, 1884. Under the specifications of the contract the contractors were responsible for damages by freshets and floods, but in drawing up the specifications no extraordinary floods were contemplated, nor further damage than by ordinary high water, such as damage by waves and ripples.

The contractors did everything in their power to prevent loss by floods, working a large force by day and night. The damage could not have been foreseen or provided against, and in my opinion they can not equitably be held responsible for this loss, amounting to $7,572.48.

Ditching and draining.—The ditching under the specification of their contract can not be paid for, except when put into the embankment, consequently no measurement was ever made by the engineers in charge of the construction of the levee, except of such ditches as were ordered dug, and paid for, because more advantageous to the Government than to pay the extra haul necessary to put the matter into the bank.

The extremely wet weather of January and February, and the low, wet, boggy character of the soil, made very extensive ditching necessary in order to get material for the levee, but as this concerned the Government only when the material was placed in the bank no measurements were made at the time, so that the figures given in the contractors' claim, namely, 9,045.5 cubic yards, can not be verified. After the subsidence of the flood the ditches were obliterated by the sand deposited by the flow, and could not be measured.

I have no reason to believe that the amount of ditching stated by the contractor was not done. The material was of such semi-fluid consistency when taken from the ditches that the greater part of it was unfit to place in the embankment when first removed, so that if any of it was paid for in the bank, as provided by the specifications, it was probably handled twice—the second time when it had dried after being cast out of the ditches.

The usual price paid for ditching is 12½ cents per cubic yard, and if it is adjudged proper to pay for such ditching, I would not advise a higher price.

This would make the contractor's claim as follows, if ditching is allowed:

For 31,552 cubic yards replaced material not paid for	$7,572 48
For 9,045.5 cubic yards ditching, at 12½ cents per cubic yard	1,130 68

I have no hesitation in advising the justice of payment for the first item, $7,572.48.

All the papers in the original claim were returned to the Engineer Department on December 28, 1883. These papers give a full history of the claim, with decision of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury upon the case.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. L. MARSHALL,
Captain of Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, U. S. A.,
Washington, D. C.:

The Acting Chief of Engineers, in replying to a communication from the House Committee on Claims, said:

"The claim is believed to be meritorious, and appeals strongly to the equitable consideration of Congress."

The Second Comptroller of the Treasury, in his decision upon the account presented by Huston & Co., said:

"The ditching can not, under the contract, be paid as such."

In regard to the claim for compensation for the work washed away, the same officer reported as follows:

"In the matter of the liability of Huston & Co., Mississippi levee contractors, to replace portion of levee washed away.

"Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of War.

"After a very careful consideration of the question as to the liabilty of the contractors, Huston & Co., to replace, without additional cost to the Government, the 31,552 cubic yards of material washed away by the flood of February, 1882, I am compelled to hold that the terms of the contract are such as to render it impossible to regard the contractors as having a legal right to payment for that portion of their work which was washed away before its completion and acceptance by the Government, and, hence, that it is not in the power of the accounting officers to grant them the relief they seek. If not restricted by the express terms of the contract, I should deem that the circumstances afforded strong reasons for allowing for the work so nearly completed, and I think it to be regretted that the interests of the contractors were not more carefully guarded in preparing the contract. The accounting officers, however, can only regard the matter in its legal aspects, and where relief is to be sought in equity, parties must look to Congress.

"Captain Marshall should be advised that in making final settlement with Messrs. Houston & Co., the value of the material washed away should not be allowed them.

"W. W. UPTON, Comptroller.

"SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
"December 14, 1883.

"A true copy.

"JAS. S. DELANO,
"Deputy Second Comptroller."

In view of these facts, your committee recommend that the sum of $7,572.48 be paid R. G. Huston & Co., in full payment for the 31,552 cubic yards of material replaced on the levee after the washout; that the claim of $1,130.68 for ditching be disallowed; that S. 749 be indefinitely postponed, and that the accompanying bill, as a substitute, allowing $7,572.48, be passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was so much noise that I could not hear the report. I have read it through myself, however, and I am satisfied, so far as I can see, that it is a satisfactory case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that conversation is so general in the Chamber that it was difficult to hear the report when read. If there be no objection the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to offer an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that all morning business is now out of order until half past 12 o'clock. The rule is express, and requires that the Calendar be proceeded with until that time.

Mr. TELLER. I am quite content if the Chair will adhere to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will try to adhere to it, and has given notice to that effect.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to present a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that the presentation of morning business is an express violation of the rule after the call of the Calendar begins until half past 12 o'clock. The rule expressly requires that the whole time until half past 12 shall be devoted to the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. The rule expressly requires that that shall be done after the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has been gone through with and has closed.

Mr. CONGER. Petitions are a part of the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business was gone through with regularly, in regular order.

Mr. VEST. May I present some petitions? I was not in when petitions were called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that they are not now in order, and will not be until half past 12 o'clock. The Senate is now acting under a rule which expressly declares that the time shall be devoted to a special class of business.

MRS. ARLANTA T. TAYLOR.

The bill (H. R. 7310) granting a pension to Mrs. Arlanta T. Taylor was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

MRS. MARY SHANNON.

The bill (S. 396) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Shannon, widow and administratrix of the estate of Joseph R. Shannon, deceased, and to provide for the payment of the loss of the steamboat A. W. Quarrier, was announced as next in order.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Claims, May 27, 1886.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the number of the report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twelve hundred and forty-five. It is a long report. Does the Senator call for the reading of the entire report?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I did call for, but as it is a very large claim and involves the question of considering why this matter was not brought before the Southern Claims Commission, where it ought to have gone as I think, I am of the impression that it is one of the things which ought not to be considered in five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. TELLER. Before it goes over I wish to say one word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection having been made, debate on the bill is not now in order.

Mr. TELLER. I will say it, then, upon the next bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the objection in order to allow the Senator to say what he wishes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. TELLER. This bill has been here a number of times. It has been as thoroughly examined by the Committee on Claims as any case ever was. It has been repeatedly reported to this body and has passed the Senate on three occasions I think. The reports have been very voluminous and full. I venture to say that there is no case which has been more thoroughly examined than this case. It has been here ever since I have been in Congress. It was here ten years ago, a live and active claim.

In the mean time the claimant himself has died. If he was deserving, if the Government owed him this money, he ought to have had it years and years ago. He died in poverty and in want. His family are now demanding this, and I think that the case ought to be taken up and either passed or defeated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

STONY POINT MONUMENT.

The joint resolution (S. R. 67) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect at Stony Point, N. Y., a monument, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $25,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the erection of a suitable monument, column, or memorial structure on the grounds of the Government at Stony Point, N. Y., with such inscriptions and emblems as may properly commemorate the historical events which occurred at that place and vicinity during the war of the Revolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire to say with relation to the joint resolution just passed that I am opposed to it. I did not propose to interpose my single objection to its passage, but I am opposed to the principle of the measure in totò.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I concur with the Senator from Missouri.

ADDISON C. FLETCHER'S ASSIGNEES.

The consideration of the bill (S. 2560) for the relief of Hyland C. Kirk and others, assignees of Addison C. Fletcher, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending to insert the word "alleged" before the word "use," in the beginning of line 17.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. PLATT from the Committee on Patents May 28, 1886.

Mr. PLATT. I will inquire of the Senator from Vermont whether it will not be satisfactory to read the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which is the last exhibit, Exhibit G of the report, and which I think sets out substantially all the facts the Senator would desire to know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will take that to begin with. I would a little rather have the recommendation of the Senator from Connecticut than of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. PLATT. This is a long report, and I want to say that a bill was referred to us authorizing the Court of Claims to render a final judgment in this case; but on looking it over carefully we thought we ought not to commit that power to the Court of Claims, and so we have recommended that the Court of Claims shall investigate and find the facts and report to Congress. It might be sent under the Bowman act in that way except that the statute of limitations runs against the claim, and except also that it is an assigned claim. I think all these facts are susceptible of explanation, so that in this case we ought to refer to the Court of Claims to find the facts and report their finding to Congress.

That is all the committee have recommended, and I do not think there can be any objection to that course. It reserves the final question of whether we will pay this claim when the facts are found and reported to Congress. I do not think there was any laches on the part of the inventor or his assignees in letting the statute of limitations run against the claim. They have been bringing suits and have failed in them for one reason and another. They have been trying to get their rights; and it is not six years since the Court of Claims first held that they had jurisdiction in these matters. I think the parties have been diligent in insisting on their rights. And I do not think there has been anything about this assignment which really should debar them from having the facts found by the Court of Claims. I trust there will be no objection to that.

I wish to say that there is a proposed amendment, to insert the word "alleged" before the word "use," in line 17. We do not want to commit Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has been agreed to, and I have one or two more amendments to move in the same line. I move to amend the bill in line 10 by inserting after the word "Missouri," after the description of these claimants, the words "claiming to be;" so as to read:

Claiming to be assignees and owners of letters patent.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have two other amendments which I will state. In line 15, after the word "and," I move to amend by inserting "alleged to have been;" so as to read:

And alleged to have been duly assigned to said owners.

Mr. PLATT. There is no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment inserting the word "alleged" before the word "use," in the beginning of line 17, is already agreed to. Then in line 29, after the word "aforesaid," I move to amend by inserting "and the rights of the claimants and;" so as to read:

Title to the invention described therein and used by the Government as aforesaid, and the rights of the said claimants, and to determine the amounts of the several interests of the assignees, &c.

So as to open all that would go for them or against them.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to any of these amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I wish to add at the end what I think would be inferred from what has taken place before, but to make it clear:

In said investigations every question on the merits shall be open—

So as to keep it all perfectly free.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection whatever to these amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10, after the word "Missouri," it is proposed to insert "claiming to be;" in line 15, after the word "and" and before "duly," to insert "alleged to have been;" in line 29, after the word "aforesaid," to insert "and the rights of the claimants and;" and at the end of the bill to add "In said investigations every question on the merits shall be open;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of Hyland C. Kirk, of Phelps, N. Y.; Richard H. Laimbeer, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mrs. Susan T. Post (executrix), of New Haven, Conn.; Dr. A. G. Coleman, of Canandaigua, N. Y.; George V. Chapin, of Chapinville, N. Y.; Isaac Roy, of Phelps, N. Y.; W. F. Van Deventer, of Elizabeth, N. J.; Dr. Edward Chapin, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mrs. Mary Magee, of Kansas City, Mo., claiming to be assignees and owners of letters patent numbered 101604, dated April 5, 1870 (antedated October 5, 1869), for an improvement in adhesive postal and revenue stamps, issued to Addison C. Fletcher and alleged to have been duly assigned to said owners, together with the right of recovery and compensation for the alleged use thereof by the United States Government in the collection of revenue on distilled spirits and malt liquors during the years 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872, be, and is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a judicial investigation and finding of the facts, namely: To determine the validity of letters patent numbered 101604, dated April 5, 1870 (antedated October 5, 1869), giving to Addison C. Fletcher title to the invention described therein and used by the Government as aforesaid and the rights of the claimants; and to determine the amounts of the several interests of the assignees of said Fletcher recognized as owners and claimants in this act, according to the records of the United States Patent Office; to determine to what extent said stamp was manufactured and used by the Government, and a legal and equitable rate of compensation therefor; finally, to find the aggregate sum or sums to which the several claimants named in this act are equitably entitled as compensation for the use of said stamp, and to report their said findings to Congress. In said investigations every question on the merits shall be open.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJ. JAMES BELGER.

The bill (S. 1520) for the relief of Maj. James Belger was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Maj. James Belger, of the Quartermaster's Department, now on the retired-list of the Army, to be a lieutenant-colonel on said list, from and after the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report. That is rather an extraordinary proposition on the face of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. The report is of some considerable length. I do not know that I shall object to the reading of it, but I can state the case more briefly if the Senator will accept that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will with pleasure.

Mr. HAWLEY. Major Belger entered the service in 1832 as a private soldier, was promoted to be a second lieutenant October, 1838, and first lieutenant in 1843, and a major and quartermaster in 1861; he was appointed a colonel and additional aid July, 1862, and went out of the service, as I will hereafter explain, November, 1863; he came back into the service March 3, 1871; was retired in 1879, being sixty-two years of age. He stood very high in the Army as a faithful and excellent officer. He was placed in command at Baltimore of the very important depot there early in the war on account of his abilities, having charge of the immense business of purchasing and employing transports and furnishing supplies to troops. The Government refused to allow him to accept a commission as major-general of Pennsylvania troops because of his usefulness there. He was also chief quartermaster of the middle division under General Schenck.

In February, 1863, a Philadelphia newspaper made a severe attack upon his management, claiming that there was crookedness. The Secretary of War sent for General Schenck to consult about it, and General Schenck said there was no use in trying him, for they would not find anything against him. He had great confidence in Belger. Nevertheless Belger pressed for a hearing, and a court-martial was ordered, composed of officers of high standing, presided over by the well-known General Hitchcock. Belger was tried on thirteen specifications. For some thirty days the court investigated the case and unanimously acquitted him on every one of the specifications; but nevertheless Secretary Stanton, in one of those impetuosities that distinguished the great Secretary, ordered him to be summarily dismissed from the Army. The general spent two years in getting his accounts settled, extending to $11,000,000, and not one penny of error was found in them. He did this in poverty and in actual distress for the necessaries of life. He got a little employment in the Treasury Department, under which he earned in the course of a year or more $1,883.16.

For eight years he was out of the service, two or two and a half of which it took him to settle up his old accounts. A bill was offered for full relief, but some amendment was put on it in the Senate, and he was put back into the service with the rank he held before being turned out eight years previously. This bill as it has been before Congress two or three sessions has had a favorable report before this, and I do not know but that it passed the Senate once. It originally proposed a great deal more than the committee thought they had a right to do or would do under the circumstances. It proposed to give him his pay for the time he was out. The Military Committee never pays a man for the time he was actually out of service, no matter how severe it may appear to be in individual cases.

But this old veteran has the sympathy and respect of everybody who knows him. He has suffered in reputation, feeling, and estate beyond measure from this disgrace. Had he continued in the service, judging by his ancient and honorable record, known to nearly all the old officers of the Army, he would have gone on the retired-list as a colonel. The Military Committee, rejecting the greater part of his pecuniary claim, which would be of very great service in paying off debts and make his few remaining years happy, was willing to say the gallant old officer should have one peg of promotion on the retired-list in the exercise of that clemency which does not ill become a great government.

That is the condition of the present bill. It will add a few hundred dollars to the old man's annual revenue, and it ought to be a great consolation to his honor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was not all that part of the subject disposed of when he was restored and put on the retired-list? I believe I was here; I remember it vaguely.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill introduced to relieve Major Belger in 1871 by Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, received the unanimous report of the committee and was passed, but amendments were offered by Senators Howe and Nye, and Senator Wilson accepted them, as he was obliged to do, to get the bill through, but he was dissatisfied. He advised that the major should accept the act, take what he could get then, and ask for further relief; and Senators Howe and Nye, who moved those amendments, afterward declared that had they understood the case they would not have offered the amendments. Of course this does not create a legal demand, but it establishes in the view of the committee the equity of the case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a thing that we often do, first decide a matter, and then after a year or two, when force enough can be got to decide it over again, and so on and so on.

Now, whatever may have been the original merits of Major Belger's dismissal—and in respect to which this report speaks in language about Secretary Stanton that I should not agree to—the matter has once been completely considered and decided by the Senate, as this report states, against the judgment of Mr. Wilson; but it was the judgment of the Senate that Major Belger should only be restored to take rank from the date of his restoration. Now it is proposed to retry that matter and have him take rank from the date of his dismissal with pay.

Mr. HAWLEY. No, Mr. President, it just puts him up another step on the retired-list. It does not put him where he would have been at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That comes to the same thing. If he had been restored to take rank from the date of his dismissal, he would have gone up to where it is proposed now to put him.

Mr. HAWLEY. He would undoubtedly have been a colonel; but this gives no back pay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This being now settled, next year we can try it again and give him the benefit, just as we shall be asked to do about some other gentlemen distinguished, well or ill, in such matters. I am sorry to feel obliged to vote against this bill. I am not going to object to its consideration. I merely want to say that, without any regard to the question of what could be done if this were res nova. I think it is a very dangerous and unwholesome practice for the Houses of Congress to be iterating and reiterating their decisions upon matters of this kind or any other kind except general legislation, and as little of that as possible.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no sort of apprehension that Congress will ever give him the pay during the time he was out of the service; certainly not while the Military Committee remains at all of the opinion it now holds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATE OF GEORGIA—DIRECT-TAX ACT.

Mr. HAMPTON. Yesterday I asked that Order of Business 1310, being the bill (S. 2457) for the relief of the State of Georgia, should be passed over informally, as I had some facts that I meant to submit. I ask to call it up now, and crave the indulgence of the Senate to let me offer an amendment, and state some facts that I wish to present, and then the bill may go over for future consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill referred to with a view to submitting some remarks, and then have it go over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2457) for the relief of the State of Georgia.

Mr. HAMPTON. I offer an amendment to the bill, which I ask to have read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendatory acts thereto, with such additional credits as under said act they are entitled to have in consequence of having paid any portion thereof without expense of collection to the United States; and such sums also as have been collected from lands or owners thereof under supplemental acts on any account whatever.

SEC. 2. That all moneys still due to the United States on the quota of direct tax apportioned by section 8 of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, are hereby remitted and relinquished.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to reimburse each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia for all money found due to them under the provisions of this act; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed to pay the same: Provided, That when the sums, or any part thereof, credited to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia have been collected from any citizen thereof, either directly or by sale, resale, or lease of property, such sums shall be held in trust by such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for the benefit of those of its citizens from whom it was collected, or their legal representatives.

Mr. HAMPTON. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes that I may present some facts in support of the substitute for the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee by the senior Senator from Mississippi.

The status of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, and the amendatory acts are in very great confusion. Some of the States have paid that tax in full, having assumed its payment under the provisions of the law and received a discount which was offered to such States as would assume it and thus avoid the expense to the General Government of collecting it by its own machinery. From other States a large portion of it has been collected, either directly from the citizens or from the sale of property; and under an utterly erroneous ruling of a former Comptroller of the Treasury it has been treated as a debt against the States in cases in which they did not assume it; and amounts due to said States by the General Government have been set-off against it. It is perfectly clear that the tax was not a debt against the States unless under the provisions of the law they assumed its payment; and consequently as there could be no set-off except of claims held in "mutual right," these set-offs were in violation of law and without authority.

The bill introduced and favorably reported by the honorable Senator from Mississippi deals with this simple question of set-off, and with that alone; and while it is unquestionably proper that it should be introduced into the bill, it is manifestly unjust that it should be dealt with singly and that other cases of still greater hardship should remain undisposed of.

Three different and conflicting reports as to the status of these accounts have been furnished to the Senate from the Treasury Department, one by the present Secretary, made up by a commission in the Department under his direction, one by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and one by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Judge Folger. These very discrepancies stated in these statements is a very conclusive reason for dealing with the whole question and making a final disposition of it at one time; and the amendment which I have offered provides for this by refunding to the States the amounts which have been heretofore collected from them and remit those which remain unpaid. This will accomplish the purpose of the bill of the Senator from Mississippi and will at the same time equalize to some extent, and so far as can now be done, the hardships which have been inflicted upon other States by the mode of enforcing this tax; and a reference to the Journals of the Senate will show that the Legislatures of several States have heretofore instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives to support such a measure as that embodied in the amendment which I have offered.

Each of the three statements to which I have referred gives approximately the same sums as having been paid by the States of Georgia and Mississippi. Mississippi's quota was $413,084.67, upon which has been paid either by collection or by credits from amounts as due the State, as arising from the 5 percents due on the sales of the public lands, $74,742.57, leaving a balance of $338,342.10 as a debt due by the State of Mississippi to the United States, upon which, under the ruling of the Treasury Department, there will be credited from year to year whatever sums may arise from the sale of the public lands and the swamp-land interests of that State. The quota of the State of Georgia was $584,367.33, upon which was credited, on account of recognized demands due the State of Georgia by the United States, the sum of $74,407.75, leaving a balance as a debt due by that State, under the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury, of $512,959.58. These figures are taken from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to the Senate resolution of March 28, 1884, and are no doubt approximately correct. By the same statement it appears that the quota of South Carolina was $363,570.67, and on account of which there has been collected from citizens as taxes, either directly from the citizens in money or by sale of their real estate, the sum of $377,962.30, showing that as taxes the sum of $14,390.63 has been collected from the State in excess of its entire quota.

Not only, therefore, has there been an excess of $14,390.63 collected as taxes according to this statement over and above the entire quota of the State, in addition to a large sum paid directly to the direct-tax commissioners in money, but there were sold in the county of Beaufort the entire town of Beaufort, and 52,000 acres of agricultural land, which produced the long-staple sea-island cotton, were sold to realize the balance of this excessive sum. In the case of De Treville vs. Smalls (98 United States, 517) the Supreme Court held that under a special and peculiar provision of the law an absolute and incontestable title passed at these sales. This is to be taken as an accepted result. The Court of Claims has decided, in the case of Simons vs. United States (19 Court of Claims, 601), that a large amount of the interest thus collected was illegal and "without warrant of law;" and in two recent decisions by the same court, which will appear in the twenty-first volume of its reports, the cases of Seabrook vs. United States and Lawton vs. United States, the court has held that a large amount of the taxes for which this land was sold was excessive and illegally collected.

In this last case the "Hill Place," valued" at $4,400 "in proportion to the whole valuation of the State," was sold to pay the tax and bought by the United States for $1,100 for a tax of $170.50, whereof the court holds that $79.11 "was illegally collected of the claimant without warrant of law." Lawton's other place, known as the "Lawton Place," valued at $7,200, was bought by the United States for $3,000, and in order to redeem the same he was required to pay the sum of $600.47; and of this collection the court says that "a mathematical calculation shows that he should have paid only $326.91," and that there was illegally collected of him without warrant of law the sum of $273.91: So that this enormous amount of real estate was sold for the collection of the tax, and which was sold at so great a sacrifice, was also sold, as decided by the Court of Claims, for a tax greatly in excess of the amount with which it was legally chargeable.

What I have said showing the peculiar hardships of this matter in relation to South Carolina is equally applicable to several other States, though not in the same degree, and especially to Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. On the other hand, it is said with great justice that the Northern and Western States, which have assumed and paid these taxes, should not be lost sight of in the adjustment of the question which releases the seceding States of the balances which were charged against them. In the right and justice of this claim I fully concur, and the amendments which I have offered fully provide for their cases, as it does for that of South Carolina and the other Southern States I have just mentioned. The statute making the original levy of $20,000,000 to be raised by direct taxation was for the purpose of meeting a great emergency in the inception of the war between the States.

It was a mode of taxation which was not favorably received in this country, and, as I have said, was resorted to in an imminent emergency. The original act provided for the raising of this sum annually; but it was discontinued after the first year; and on the 2d of February, 1867, a concurrent resolution was adopted by Congress suspending its operation for the first year, and leaving balances uncollected such as now stand against the States of Mississippi and Georgia.

In this connection I send to the desk to be incorporated in my remarks an extract from the letter of Hon. Charles J. Folger, late Secretary of the Treasury, upon this subject, dated June 14, 1884, in which he earnestly recommends the passage of a bill in all material respects identical in its provisions with the amendment which I have presented.

The extract referred to is as follows:

The purpose of the bill is to relieve and discharge from further liability for that tax those States and Territories which have not paid the portion thereof apportioned to them respectively; and to repay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to those States and Territories which have paid any portion, the sums by them respectively paid. Though by the act above cited this tax was made an annual one, an attempt to collect it for more than one year has never been made. By that attempt there were collected about $15,000,000, principally from the States which did not seek to go out of the Union; and there were left uncollected about $5,000,000, principally in the States which did seek to go out of the Union. The sum uncollected remains a charge against these States, and, for the purposes of this letter, it may be assumed that it is a valid and enforceable charge. It is plain, however, that no legislator at this day would propose to raise revenue by a tax of that kind. There is no need of resorting to such methods. The revenue of the Government from sources not so extraordinary, and collectible by means and appliances not so objectionable as those involved therein, are ample for its purposes. They are, indeed, superabundant, and the concern of statesmen is rather how they may be reduced than how they may be increased. The Government then needs not the money to be got by enforcing this tax.

At the same time, it is plain that to enforce it would put a grievous burden upon the people of the States which are in default in payment. It needs no array of facts to show. Congress in one if not both branches has this session considered the proposition of large pecuniary aid to these people to help them place and keep up common schools, and the Senate has passed a bill therefor.

If there be need for that succor, there would be harm in enforcing this charge. It is to be considered, too, that while taxes are seldom looked upon with favor, this would be specially objectionable. The purpose for which it was laid can but be remembered with distaste. It can scarcely be expected that there would be cheerful aid from the State authorities in the enforcement of it. It may be doubted whether there would be any. Indeed it would, without further legislation, have to be enforced by the machinery provided by the act under which it was laid. This would call for the appointment of numerous Federal officials, who would go among the people as obnoxious exactors. I think it must be conceded that there is, and ever will be, great reluctance to ever setting about the collection of this tax. That it never had great favor is shown by that it was never put in force but one year. In practical effect, then, the law for it is obsolete. Why, then, should there remain this unenforced liability, a menace to the people, the enforcement of which is called for by no public need, nor by any public opinion?

In my judgment, the people and the property of the States in default should be relieved and discharged from it.

But to give such relief and discharge would be to put an inequality of burden upon the States which paid, unless they in turn were in some way relieved. This the bill proposes to do by repaying to them the sums received from them. Assuming that the tax was lawful, and the collection, as far as made, was warranted, this, apart from the circumstances, would be a proposition to donate to the States surplus moneys of the United States—a proposition which I should not favor. But, as connected with the proposition to discharge from onerous and needless liability one portion of the people, it takes on a different character; it is presented as an adjustment between different bodies of the people, and is worthy of acceptation. Indeed, it would be unjust to the people of the loyal States to release the people of the once insurrectionary States from their liability without refunding to the former the sums paid by them, and there are analogies in the legislation of Congress.

Acts have been passed refunding to States moneys raised by them for the raising, arming, and equipping of troops for the Army of the United States in the civil war and for making other refunds of like character. The purpose of laying this direct tax was to aid in the ultimate payment of the extraordinary expenses of the Government caused by the civil war. The raising, arming, and equipping of troops by the States served to keep down those expenses for the time. It was a voluntary act upon the part of the States. There is no violation of principle or fundamental law in repaying to the States from the funds of the United States the cost thereof. The purpose and effect of this bill is not so unlike in nature to that as not also to be freed from the objections to a bald distribution among the States of what are called the surplus revenues of the United States.

Under the peculiar facts of the case, and as it is not likely to become a precedent for other disposals of Federal moneys, my judgment is, that the proposed measure is a good one. It is true that exactly equal justice can not be done in carrying out the proposition of the bill. Thus, in some of the Southern States the tax was to some extent enforced. Tax sales were made of pieces of real estate in instances for less than the value of them. Only the surplus of purchase-money over the tax and charges has been available to the owners, and they have lost the difference between that and the total of the purchase-money, and between the purchase-money and the real value.

On the other hand, in most, if not all, of the Northern States the payment to the United States of the tax was assumed by the State government, which collected the amount of its own people in its own tax-levy. Of course, in the changes of citizenship and ownership of taxable property, while a repayment into the State treasury will tend to reduce the amount of State tax, it will not inure to the benefit of some of those who in 1861 were tax-payers. But these failures of full and general compensation in dealing with transactions so long past must ensue, and are not to be potentially urged against proposed measures, which in the main do work equal benefit.

Mr. HAMPTON. I also request the insertion in my remarks of the extract from the letter of Hon. William Lawrence, late Comptroller of the Treasury, to the Secretary in regard to the same bill.

The extract is as follows:

The object of these bills is to remit, so far as not collected or paid, the direct taxes laid upon and apportioned to the States, Territories, and District of Columbia under the direct tax act of August 5, 1861, and to refund to such States, Territories, and District, respectively, the amount of such taxes, so far as paid in any mode whatever.

I have considered the subject with care, and now have the honor to state that in my judgment it is alike just, judicious, and practicable to remit all such taxes not yet collected, to refund the amounts paid in any form by any State or Territory, and to refund to private persons or their legal representatives all amounts of such tax by them paid, or collected by sale of real estate, or otherwise.

Mr. HAMPTON. I call attention to the additional fact, that besides the sum already mentioned in excess of the quota of South Carolina the Government has realized from profits on purchase and resales of land the sum of $315,677.86, and still holds upward of 4,000 acres of valuable sea-island cotton lands as military reservations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over under the rule, and the next case will be stated.

CONFINEMENT OF INEBRIATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2545) to provide for the confinement of inebriates in the Government Hospital for the Insane.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has already been read at length and the amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia acted upon. The bill is still open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUCINDA M'GUIRE.

The bill (S. 2588) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Lucinda McGuire, of Memphis, Tenn., $10,260, in full compensation for the use of her premises Nos. 195 and 197 Main street, in the city of Memphis, Tenn., from March 24, 1863, until June 1, 1865.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, June 2, 1886.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand this will lead to some debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will allow the reading of the report to be finished. I do not think it will lead to any debate.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will consent that the reading of the report shall be finished.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, submitted by Mr. FAIR June 2, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 694) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire, having considered the same, submit the following report:

The petitioner presents the following claim against the United States, and asks the action of Congress, as the only tribunal to which she can apply for relief:

The United States to Lucinda McGuire, Dr.

For rent of two rooms in premises 195 and 197 Main street, Memphis, Tenn., from January 25, 1863, to March 24, 1863, at $25 per month	$98 34
For rent of entire premises from March 24, 1863, to May 31, 1865, at $4,000 per annum each	17,466 66
For direct damage and injury done said property during and by reason of said occupation	5,000 00
	22,565 00
Less amount paid on account by R. E. Clary, Deputy Quartermaster-General, United States Army	1,526 78
	21,038 22

By the evidence presented to the committee it is proven that Lucinda McGuire was the child and heir-at-law of William Lawrence, who died in Memphis in 1854, and that by direction of the proper court of Shelby County, Tennessee, the proceeds of his estate were invested by commissioners for her benefit in the property in question. It is also further proven that at the time this property was occupied by the United States the claimant was a minor.

It appears from the certificate of William H. Morgan, colonel commanding, that two rooms in the second story of this property were occupied about January 25, 1863, as a guard station for a patrol and provost guard detailed from the Seventy-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

It further appears from the following order that the whole property was occupied March 24, 1863:

"SIR: You will deliver to the bearer the keys to the houses in the Webster Block now in your possession.

"Rental office, March 24, 1863.

"G. W. VAUGHN, Rental Agent.

"H. D. CONNELL."

It further appears from the following evidence that the property was occupied by the United States until May 31, 1865:

MEMPHIS, TENN., June 1, 1865.

I certify on honor that two tenements in Webster Block, in the city of Memphis, Tenn., said to belong to the estate of Mr. Lawrence, deceased, were occupied by the United States Government for hospital purposes and known as "Webster General Hospital," from the 24th day of March, 1863, to the 31st day of May, 1865, inclusive; two years, two months, and six days.

B. J. D. IRWIN,
Surgeon United States Army,
Superintendent United States Army General Hospital.

DEPUTY QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Memphis, Tenn., June 1, 1865.

SIR: The two buildings in the Webster Block heretofore rented from you for military purposes being no longer required, the rent for which will cease on the 31st May, 1865.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. E. CLARY,
Deputy Quartermaster-General.

J. G. LONSDALE, Esq.,
Memphis, Tenn.

All of the facts in the case being clearly proved, we have simply to determine whether the claimant is entitled to recover rent from the United States, and, if so, in what amount.

The claimant being a minor at the time of occupation of property, the question of loyalty does not arise, and, though perhaps not pertinent to the case, the loyalty of her guardian, J. G. Lonsdale, is fully proved by documentary evidence.

The fact that the property was taken possession of by a "rental agent" of the United States would seem in itself an implied promise or contract with the owner that the United States would pay a proper rental for its use.

It also further appears that Deputy Quartermaster-General Clary did pay to the guardian of the claimant the sum of $1,526.78 on account of rent, and his relinquishment of the property clearly specifies it as property "heretofore rented, * * * the rent for which will cease on the 31st of May, 1865."

It therefore appears to the committee that although possession of the property was taken, perhaps, without the express permission of the claimant, it was taken by an agent of the Government, whose office as "rental agent" implied the purpose of paying rent for the same. But, beyond that, the fact that payment was actually made on account of rent, so clearly establishes in law the relation of landlord and tenant between the Government and the claimant that we have no alternative but to determine what amount of rent is due the claimant.

It is plain from the evidence that the sum of $1,526.78 paid by General Clary was in full of the rent due from February 18, 1865, to June 1, 1865, which was estimated by the parties at $450 per month. Mr. Lonsdale's receipt for money paid him shows that this was the rent rate agreed upon; and while the houses may have rented for more, both before and after this time, as is shown by the papers, still we think the Government should pay no more than it is thus shown was agreed to be paid, namely, $450 per month.

The occupation of two rooms in the building from January 25, 1863, to March 24, 1863, does not appear to have been under any contract, express or implied, but a necessity arising from military occupation of the city. Your committee therefore recommend that so much of said claim be rejected.

Claimant further asks $5,000 for damages caused to the building by reason of their occupation. It appears that immediately after the building was relinquished by the Government it was rented at the same rate that it was before the occupation, nor does the damage seem to have been very great; for which reasons it is recommended that this part of the claim be rejected.

Your committee are of opinion that claimant is entitled to rent at the rate of $450 per month from March 24, 1863, to February 18, 1865, and accordingly report the accompanying bill as a substitute for S. 694, and recommend its passage; and further recommend that the original bill (S. 694) be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand the bill will lead to discussion and will have to go over anyhow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not present this morning in time for morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will have time to present morning business till half past 12 o'clock, which will arrive in ten minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT SAINT LOUIS.

The bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo., was announced as next in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. That will lead to discussion. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

HIRAM BERDAN.

The bill (S. 2619) authorizing a settlement of the claim of Hiram Berdan, assignee of the Berdan Fire-arms Manufacturing Company, was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

Mr. PLATT. Will not the Senator listen to a word of explanation?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With great pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. General Berdan was not an Army officer. He acquired his title in the volunteer service. He was the originator and organizer of the Berdan sharpshooters. In 1866 a board of officers was convened to invite proposals from inventors of their inventions to be used in the alteration of the Springfield muskets. General Berdan offered his inventions. Some of them were undeniably used. Questions arise as to whether others of them were used; but there is now a recommendation by the Chief of Ordnance recommending—

That Congress confer upon the Court of Claims full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims made by the Berdan Fire-arms Manufacturing Company, and what amount of compensation, if any, the company is justly entitled to receive from the United States for the use of the invention.

It is communicated to Congress by a letter of the Secretary of War in reply to an inquiry of mine, and the Secretary of War says:

I concur in the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance "that Congress confer upon the Court of Claims full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims made by the Berdan Fire-arms Manufacturing Company, and what amount of compensation, if any, the company is justly entitled to receive from the United States for the use of the invention."

Now with regard to the statute of limitations I want to say that I doubt very much whether the statute of limitations runs against this case. There has been the continued use by the Government up to a period within six years of some of the inventions of General Berdan; and with regard to the assignment of the claim I do not think that that should stand in the way, because the Berdan Fire-arms Manufacturing Company was the party nominally in interest, but really General Berdan was pretty much all there was of the Berdan Fire-arms Manufacturing Company, and although the claim has been assigned to him, he has been the real party in interest all the way through.

I know something about the alteration of this gun, and did for a great many years before I came to the Senate, and I am quite sure that General Berdan is entitled to some compensation. I do not undertake to say how much; but I thought and the committee thought, in view of the recommendation of the Secretary of War, who has full understanding of this subject, that it was one of those cases where he should have the right to go to the Court of Claims and have his rights determined.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to say a word before I object. Twenty years after these events is a good while to open a patent case, as it seems to me, with great respect; and then, if it is to go to the Court of Claims at all, it seems to me it ought to go on the same principles that the beer-stamp bill rested, and that was to proceed and take evidence and make their findings and report to Congress, and not undertake to say, as this bill does, how and in what way they shall do it.

The court is, as the bill now stands, required to have a judicial proceeding, and on certain principles of evidence they are to take "into consideration any and all records, correspondence, and official reports in the War Department, &c. All these may be evidence or they may not, depending upon particular circumstances as to how they arose. We should not undertake to lay down a rule of evidence for the Court of Claims, and then direct them to render final judgment for a sum unlimited by Congress, to be paid out of the Treasury. That, it seems to me, is unsafe; and when the bill comes up again I shall move to strike out all after the word "them," in line 27, and insert:

And report the findings of said court, with all the evidence taken, to Congress.

So that the authority of the court will be to investigate into all the facts, the validity of the patents, and the rights and the claims of thi man, whether there was an infringement of a patent or a use in the reg ular way, and make their findings, and return them with the evidence to Congress.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow the bill to go over without prejudice until to-morrow morning, and I can confer with him in the mean time and perhaps we can arrive at some understanding which will satisfy him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, unless by some accident I should not be here, and in that case I should stand by the objection. I do not object for myself to letting it go over without prejudice until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

ELIZA ELLEN EHLE.

The bill (S. 1775) for the relief of Eliza Ellen Ehle was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments: in line 26, after the word "same," to insert "together with interest;" and in line 27, after the name "Eliza Ellen Ehle," to insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine into the claim of Eliza Ellen Ehle, of Canajoharie, State of New York, to be paid the value, with the accrued interest on the date when they were called for redemption and when interest was stopped, of the following-described coupon bonds, which were purchased by said Eliza Ellen Ehle and believed to have been destroyed, namely: Four 5-20 United States bonds, issued July 1, 1865, numbered 123289, 123290, 123291, and 123292, of the value of $100 each; also three 5-20 United States bonds, issued July 1, 1867, numbered 106418, 106425, and 106426, of the value of $100 each; and if the Secretary of the Treasury, after such examination, is satisfied that said bonds are destroyed, and is also satisfied that they have not since been presented to and paid by the Government, he shall cause the value of the same, together with interest, as aforesaid, to be paid to the said Eliza Ellen Ehle, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the said Eliza Ellen Ehle shall execute and file with the Secretary of the Treasury a bond of indemnity, with at least two good and sufficient sureties, citizens of the United States, in a penalty double the amount provided to be paid hereunder, the sufficiency of which shall be properly certified by a court or courts of competent jurisdiction, guaranteeing the United States against any future demand or liability on account of the said bonds and coupons, or either of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would seem that the amendment, "together with interest," is put in such connection as would make these bonds bear interest down to the time the Secretary of the Treasury is to pay this lady, which is not right. If she has lost her bonds, and they were of the kind that have long since been called and paid, she only ought to be paid the face of the bonds and the face of the coupons. The United States has always been ready to pay them since they have been called, and therefore it seems to me that the bill ought to be amended a little.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past 12 o'clock having arrived, this will stand over.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before this is passed over I hope the Senator will allow me to offer an amendment in the line of what the Senator from Vermont suggests, so that it may be pending when the bill comes up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be at the head of the Calendar to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to offer an amendment now so that it may be pending. In line 6, after the words "interest on," I move to insert "the same up to the date of the call for the redemption and payment;" so as to read:

To be paid the value, with the accrued interest on the same, up to the date of the call for the redemption and payment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to take up the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now receive morning business which was cut off, if there be no objection.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a proposed amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, have directed me to report it favorably. As the sundry civil bill is already reported to the Senate, I suppose it is not necessary that the amendment should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator he had better let it be referred. The rule requires that it shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires it expressly.

Mr. DAWES. After it has been reported by a committee?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir; still to refer it.

Mr. DAWES. Then I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate having amended the proposition made in the sundry civil bill in regard to the greenback circulation and certificates in a way that is unsatisfactory to me, I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute for the proposition of the committee, and ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the amendment be read. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks that the amendment be read. If there be no objection it will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no new United States note shall be issued of a denomination less than $10, nor more than $500; and the denominations higher than $50 shall not exceed in value one-fourth of the value of the total amount outstanding at any time; and not more than one-fourth in value of the amount of circulation issued to national banks, outstanding at any time, shall be of a less denomination than $10: Provided, further, That in all new issues "coin" certificates shall be hereafter substituted for "silver" certificates and "gold" certificates wherever either is authorized to be issued under existing laws; and all gold and silver certificates now outstanding shall be retired, if now owned by the United States, or when they are received at the Treasury or any subtreasury, and coin certificates of the denominations hereby provided for issued in their stead; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to issue "coin" certificates in denominations of one, two, and five dollars on all the surplus coin and gold bullion held at any time by the Treasury as the property of the United States in excess of $100,000,000 of gold and silver coin and gold bullion, and pay out the same in discharge of all the obligations of the United States, except such as have been heretofore made payable expressly in gold and silver coin; and it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States, upon the receipt of an original certificate of deposit issued by the United States assistant treasurer at any United States subtreasury, stating that there has been deposited therein by any person or corporation gold coin or standard silver dollars of the United States in the sum of $10, or any multiple thereof, to order payment of a like amount in coin certificates at the counter of any United States assistant treasurer designated by the depositor, in such denominations as he may request, in writing, of not less than $1 or not more than $500, which shall be redeemable in gold or silver coin at the option of the United States; and all the certificates hereby authorized when paid into the Treasury shall be reissued, or new certificates of the same denomination substituted for such as are returned because of being mutilated or defaced, as now provided by law in regard to the notes of the United States. No coin certificates shall be issued of a denomination greater than $500, and at least two-thirds of such certificates outstanding at any time shall be of denominations not exceeding $50.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSONVILLE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 453) for the erection of a public building at Jacksonville, Fla.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Now I hope we shall proceed with the river and harbor bill and finish it before adjournment to-night.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask permission to offer an amendment to the river and harbor bill in the nature of a substitute, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as can be judiciously expended during the current fiscal year, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of War to continue improvements on the principal and most important rivers and harbors in the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to expend the aforesaid appropriation, or so much thereof as can be judiciously expended, in continuing such improvements as may be most urgent and important, upon which work has been done and are now in progress of construction, and shall select such rivers and harbors as may be recommended by a board of five engineers of the Army, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, of which the Chief of Engineers shall be chairman.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That amendment will not be in order, I think, until we finish the amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not in order. The Senator from South Carolina asks that it be printed with a view of presenting it hereafter. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply desire to give notice of the amendment with the view of having it printed, and at the proper time to have it offered in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I exceedingly regret feeling compelled to occupy more of the time of the Senate upon this bill, and I would not do so were it not that attention was directed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] last evening to the several sections of the bill, sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, which are intended to prevent the obstruction of navigable streams. These are sections in which I take a deep interest, and for which I am in a measure responsible, which will need explanation at some stage of the discussion, and which explanation I prefer to make now, so that if further criticism of them be made it may be with such information upon the subject as I am able to impart.

The pending amendment does not go to the question of the prevention of obstructions by legislation. The discussion has taken a much wider range than the amendment. The only thing proposed in the clause which the committee propose to strike out is to instruct the Secretary of War to institute legal proceedings "to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining, into either of said rivers," that is, the Sacramento and the San Joaquin, and to authorize him "to use out of said sum," that is the sum which has been heretofore appropriated but not used because mining had not ceased in those rivers, as much as may be necessary to pay the necessary expenses of such proceedings.

It will be observed that by this provision of the bill new legislation making it an offense to carry on hydraulic mining in such manner as to obstruct navigable streams is not proposed. It is not proposed to change the law upon that subject. It is only proposed to make it the duty of an officer of the Government to see that proceedings are instituted for the purpose of preventing mining operations calculated to obstruct, or which in fact do obstruct these navigable rivers, and to provide for payment of the expenses of such prosecution.

This is a local matter, and I do not take a very great personal interest in it, and for that reason I am content to leave it to be discussed by the Senators from California who are familiar with the facts, but I believe it is a matter of so much importance as to justify the retention of this provision in the bill.

I am told that twenty-five years ago the Sacramento River was navigable from the city of San Francisco for 300 miles and over for large steamboats, and that the Feather River, which enters the Sacramento about 30 miles above Sacramento city, was navigable for large steamboats for a distance of about 50 miles from its mouth. To-day owing to hydraulic mining upon its banks and tributaries the bed of Feather River has been entirely filled up and the river is not navigable at all. For 30 miles between the mouth of the Feather River and Sacramento city where the water was originally 20 feet deep the bed of the river has been filled up to within 2 or 3 feet of the top of the banks, and the navigation has been very greatly impaired. These facts demonstrate the importance of this provision and the necessity for Congress to provide some means by which hydraulic mining can be stopped and the navigable character of those rivers preserved.

It has been stated here that people owning land upon the banks of the Feather River and of the Sacramento which have been overflowed and injured by mining operations have instituted private suits in the circuit court of the United States and have obtained injunctions against parties who are carrying on these mining operations. That is true; but we can not expect that individual citizens in like manner are going to institute and maintain suits at their own expense to protect the navigation of these rivers, nor can we expect that the States themselves will pass the necessary laws for that purpose or will probably protect the navigable rivers from obstruction within their own borders.

It is desirable that there should be upon this subject a uniform law, that Congress should take action upon the subject in order that the law may be uniform throughout all the States and Territories, and it ought to be made the business of some officer of the Government to prosecute for offenses under it. This is sought to be obtained by the present bill.

To show the necessity for such legislation I will read an extract from the report of Charles F. Powell, captain of engineers and now in charge of some of the most important harbor improvements in Oregon. It is made a part of Senate Executive Document 12, being a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting in compliance with law reports relating to causeways, bridges, &c., in process of erection that interfere with navigation. This report is a volume of some seventy-four pages, and contains a list of a very large number of bridges and other obstructions which interfere with the navigation of the various rivers of the country. Mr. Powell says in his report:

It has been my observation that serious detriment to navigation and much expense in improvements therefor have been caused by a dumping in the water ways of this district of miscellaneous materials, from sawdust and sweepings to trees.

* * * * * * *

The Government is engaged in improvement by snagging operations of six rivers of this engineer district. Most of the snags or pieces of drift-jams are trees washed out from banks or are saw-logs. It is not uncommon, however, to find drift made of tree trunks or stumps which have been cut in two.

On the Coquille River are many bars formed by drift of myrtle, a wood too heavy to float. I have noticed a very bad bar next above the head of present navigation formed in this way.

Much earth and rock were dumped into Yaquina Bay and River by the railroad construction already referred to. This curtailed, to a small extent it is true, but injuriously, the tidal volume, and doubtless caused some shoaling on the bars. This dumping was not only to make a railroad grade, but sometimes a spoil-bank was formed in the water.

Then he says:

There is an Oregon statute prohibiting the dumping of sawdust in the rivers below the Cascades and the Willamette Falls, but practically the law is of little avail, if any at all.

Perhaps the most aggravated case of river dumping in this district is at Portland and East Portland. The worst bar of the river ship-channel is next below these cities. Dredging has been prosecuted here to a considerable extent. Cans, matting, shoes, ashes, and other refuse have been frequently found in the dredging.

It has been noticed when Portland wharves are rebuilt that a considerable part of the old material is disposed of in the river, and that boxes, crates, packing material, &c., are sometimes thrown into the river or on the bank where high water will float them.

My attention was called to this matter some two years ago when in Oregon. I ascertained then from the engineer in charge of the Government works there that, in the construction of a railroad which had been built along the Yaquina Bay, in order to get rid of the heavy timber which had been cleared from the track it had been lashed together in rafts, which, when they went out through the mouth of the bay to sea, went through the jetty and the pile-work being constructed there by the Government, and did damage to the work to the extent of some $500. I was told also that at Swan Island Bar, just below the city of Portland, the dredging operations were greatly impeded and much additional cost was occasioned by the dumping of material, old cans, matting, old stove-pipes, ashes, and cinders into the river.

I prosecuted my inquiries further and found that Oregon was not an exception in that respect, but that the same complaint came up from the local engineers to the Chief of Engineers from every quarter. I saw not long ago in reference to the bar at Gedney's Channel that in boring to ascertain the nature of the bottom upon the bar there had been brought up cinders and other refuse which had been dumped into the harbor of New York.

Upon inquiry at the office of the Chief of Engineers I found that in 1877 Congress passed an act which required a report to be made by the Chief of Engineers or the Secretary of War to Congress "of all the instances in which piers, breakwaters, or other structures built by the United States in aid of commerce or navigation were used, occupied, or injured by a corporation or an individual, and the extent and mode of such use or injury, and the facts touching the same; and also what legislation was necessary to protect public works constructed by the United States against trespass or injury thereto;" and that the Secretary of War had, in pursuance of those provisions, made a report to Congress, accompanying which he submitted the draught of an act to protect public works against trespass or injury. The provision which I have read, contained in the act of August 14, 1876, I think has been continued in nearly every river and harbor act since passed. The report from which I have just read, made at the present session of Congress, in regard to bridges that obstruct navigation, was submitted to Congress in compliance with a similar provision contained in the last river and harbor act.

I took the draught of the bill which had been prepared by the Chief of Engineers, or under his direction, or under the direction of the Secretary of War, and compared it with the various river and harbor acts, and eliminated from the bill the various provisions which had been enacted into law in the river and harbor acts and otherwise, and introduced a bill containing the remaining provisions into the Senate at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress. It did not receive attention at that Congress, but during the present session it was brought up before the Committee on Commerce and thoroughly examined. In that examination we had the special attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] who is a member of that committee and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] who is also a member of the committee, and we made some modifications of the bill, remodeling entirely the second section, which was intended to prevent obstructions to navigable streams by bridges, and which provides that hereafter no bridge shall be constructed under the authority of any act of the Legislature of any State until the plan and location of the bridge shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War.

On the 4th day of March last I reported the bill as agreed upon by the Senate Committee on Commerce to the Senate, and it stands now the first order of business on the Calendar under the eighth rule, and would probably have been considered by the Senate before this time except for the fact that the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, probably acting upon my suggestion—they had embodied substantially like provisions before in river and harbor bills—incorporated the bill substantially as reported by the Senate committee in the river and harbor bill, and the several sections of the bill reported by myself from the Committee on Commerce are sections 2 to 7 inclusive of the river and harbor bill. I may say that they are substantially the same. The House committee inserted certain words in the first section which were intended to cover the matter of hydraulic mining in California.

Those sections of the bill were carefully considered again by the Committee on Commerce and certain amendments were made, certain amendments which were proposed by the Senator from Missouri to some of the sections and certain amendments which were proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]; so that I repeat these provisions in the river and harbor bill intended to prevent obstructions to navigable rivers represent the careful attention and action of the Committee on Commerce, being the best provisions that they could devise to accomplish the purpose.

I consider them the most important provisions of the bill, provisions which, if enforced, will save the Government out of every bill appropriating $10,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors at least half a million dollars in preventing the dumping into navigable streams of material which will form bars and obstructions to commerce and do injury to the various improvements which are being carried on by the Government.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon whether in what he is saying now as to the bill representing the deliberate, firm judgment of the Committee on Commerce he is referring to the clause on page 50 which has been reached, or does he refer generally to the legislative provisions found in the sections succeeding the appropriations?

Mr. DOLPH. Generally to the legislative provisions of which I spoke.

Mr. HALE. He is referring to the whole policy of the bill as found in those sections.

Mr. DOLPH. As found in sections 2 to 7 inclusive. The bill to which I referred and which I reported was Senate bill No. 64, introduced by myself on the 8th day of December, and reported back on the 4th day of March. Something has been said as to the power of Congress——

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me right there——

Mr. DOLPH. I wish the Senator would permit me to proceed with what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Maine can call my attention to the point he has in mind directly.

Mr. HALE. I may not be able to be here by and by.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has his own way.

Mr. DOLPH. Something has been said in regard to the power of Congress to legislate upon this subject. I am not going to devote much time to the question. It was said yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that in some of the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court it was held that the jurisdiction of the General Government over navigable rivers was like the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts in England, confined to rivers in which the tide ebbs and flows. But that proposition was abandoned in 1851 in the case of the Genesee Chief, in which it was held that the question as to whether a river is navigable in law is determined by the question whether it is navigable in fact. In the case which subsequently arose in regard to the navigation of the Fox River, which was not navigable in fact without improvement, and in which the Government had made improvements by the construction of locks and the removal of obstructions, it was held that that river was navigable in law because it was navigable in fact, although it had been made navigable in fact by the improvements made by the General Government.

As early as 1829—and I come now to the suggestion which was made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] yesterday—as early as 1829, in the case of Thompson Willson and others, plaintiffs, vs. The Black Bird Creek Marsh Company, defendants, it was held that the power of Congress to authorize and prevent obstructions to navigable streams existed. In that case by an act of the Assembly of the State of Delaware the construction of a dam by the plaintiff over a creek passing through a deep, level marsh adjoining the Delaware, upon which the tide ebbs and flows for some distance, had been authorized. The court said—I read from the syllabus:

> The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come in collision with the powers of the General Government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the States. But the measure authorized by this act stops a navigable creek—

It will be observed that this was a creek and so called—> and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it. But this abridgment, unless it comes in conflict with the Constitution or a law of the United States is an affair between the government of Delaware and its citizens, of which this court can take no cognizance.

Now the court says, and this is directly to the point:

> If Congress had passed any act in execution of the power to regulate commerce, the object of which was to control State legislation over these small navigable creeks, into which the tide ebbs and flows, and which abound throughout the lower country of the Middle and Southern States—

This takes in the bayou in Louisiana which was mentioned by the Senator from Vermont yesterday—

> we should feel not much difficulty in saying that a State law coming in conflict with such act would be void. But Congress has passed no such act. The repugnancy of the law of Delaware is placed entirely on its repugnancy to the law to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, a power which has not been so exercised as to affect this question.

To be sure this was a creek in which the tide ebbed and flowed, but as I have already said, the distinction as to the power of Congress over the navigable waters of the United States, between those in which the tide ebbs and flows and those in which it does not, was abandoned in 1851.

In the case of the Daniel Ball, cited at page 557 of 10 Wallace's Reports, it was held that—

> The doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country. Here the ebb and flow of the tide do not constitute the usual test, as in England, or any test at all, of the navigability of waters.
> The test by which to determine the navigability of our rivers is found in their navigable capacity. Those rivers are public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact.

In the case of the State of Pennsylvania vs. The Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company, reported in 13 Howard, it was held that a bridge which was constructed either under the authority of the Legislature of the State of Ohio or of the two States between which the river ran, because it interrupted navigation was an unlawful obstruction to commerce, and the defendants were required to take the bridge down.

After that Congress passed an act legalizing the bridge which was an obstruction, and in 18 Howard the same case came up for review, and it was held that Congress had power to authorize an obstruction over a navigable stream.

In the case of South Carolina vs. Georgia, reported at page 4 of 93 United States Reports, it was held that—> Congress has the same power over the Savannah River that it has over the other navigable waters of the United States.

The right to regulate commere—

Here is the point—

The right to regulate commerce includes the right to regulate navigation, and hence to regulate and improve navigable rivers and ports on such rivers.

It was held that the Government had power to close up one of the channels of a navigable river for the purpose of increasing the navigable capacity of another.

During the present session of Congress we have passed, and at every session of Congress we have passed, bills to authorize obstructions in the navigable streams wholly within the boundaries of States. At least three or four bills have passed the Senate at the present session to authorize the construction of bridges which will be more or less obstructions to navigation over the Upper Willamette River, entirely within the limits of the State of Oregon.

The Supreme Court of the United States has determined over and over again that Congress has power to regulate the navigable rivers, to authorize and to regulate the construction of bridges which will necessarily be more or less obstructions to navigable streams. They do hold, however, that until Congress interferes the States may authorize the construction of bridges which may be obstructions to commerce, if entirely within their own limits; but they hold in all these cases that if Congress once interferes and exercises its jurisdiction, the law of Congress being constitutional under that provision which gives Congress power to regulate commerce between the States, it is paramount, and the law of the State must yield to it.

I can not conceive of any difference, and I do not believe that any Senator can successfully maintain that authorizing the obstruction to navigation in a navigable stream wholly within the limits of a State by the construction of a bridge is any different in principle from authorizing or regulating the construction of a pier or a jetty, or requiring the removal of a sunken vessel in a channel, or making it a misdemeanor to dump material into the river by which a bar will be formed which it will be necessary to remove before the river can be navigated. There is no difference, in fact, so far as the power of Congress is concerned.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] argued that because hydraulic mining carried on in California is carried on upon the tributaries of the Sacramento and Feather Rivers remote from the places where the detritus is finally deposited in the bed of the rivers and where it forms obstructions, there is no constitutional power in Congress to prevent it. Sir, the power in Congress is to prevent the obstruction to the navigable streams, and it is immaterial whether the débris or the material which is to form the obstruction is thrown in from the bank or whether it is placed in a situation where, by the current and the storms of heaven and the operations of nature, it may be carried into the stream in sufficient quantities to obstruct navigation.

It is a little curious to note how business is sometimes transacted in this body. Yesterday a bill was passed by the Senate without question containing precisely the same provision as contained in section 2 of this bill, local in its character, elaborate in its provisions, and expensive to execute, while these provisions which have been criticised by Senators are general in their character, will prove efficacious, and are to be carried into effect and enforced by the existing machinery and present officers of the Government. I refer to the bill which was passed to prevent obstructions and injurious deposits in harbors adjacent to New York city, which provides:

That the placing, discharging, or depositing by any process or in any manner, of refuse, dirt, ashes, cinders, mud, sand, &c., in the tidal waters of the harbor of New York, or its adjacent or tributary waters, is hereby strictly forbidden, and every such act is made a misdemeanor.

It will be seen that substantially the same provision is found in a bill which passed the Senate without discussion as that contained in section 2 of the river and harbor bill which has been the subject of criticism by the Senators from Kansas and Vermont.

Mr. President, I do not wish to continue this discussion. I felt it incumbent upon me to show the necessity of the legislation proposed by sections 2 to 7 of this bill so far as I could in this brief and hurried manner, to show that it is legislation which is approved by the War Department, which was recommended in 1877, which has received the approval of the local engineers, and that these provisions had received the consideration of the Senate Committee on Commerce.

Any general provision like this, which is intended to protect the public interests and may interfere with private interests, meets with opposition. It is extremely difficult to obtain such legislation. By the action of the House committee and the House we have it within our power to secure this legislation. It may injuriously affect certain interests in the State of California, but I do not care how profitable hydraulic mining may be in that State, it ought not to be permitted to be continued to the detriment of the public or the injury of the navigation on the rivers of the State and to the destruction of the commerce of the State. It may interfere with some manufacturing interests, with the proprietors of saw-mills who desire from motives of economy to dump their slabs, edgings, and sawdust into the stream, and it may interfere with other manufacturing establishments; but there is no general law which we can enact for the public good which may not interfere with some private interests. I consider these provisions so important, that I hope the Senate will not hastily reject them, but will allow them to become a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] amending the text of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the question be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1210, in the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Commerce, after the word "mining," it is proposed to insert "by water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure;" so as to read:

If he be not satisfied, he is hereby instructed to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining, by water used through pipes, and used through nozzles under pressure, into either of said rivers or any of its tributaries, or into the San Joaquin River or any of its tributaries, or in or to such place or situation from which such detritus, débris, or slickens may be liable to be washed or carried by storms or floods into either of said rivers or tributaries; and he is hereby instructed to use out of said sum as much as may be necessary for said purpose.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the chairman of the committee oblige us with the information upon what ground the elimination of this paragraph was recommended by the committee?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The portion—

Mr. INGALLS. Before he answers that question, I would suggest to him that I find on page 62 an amendment that seems to be directed to exactly the same purpose as the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, and that the committee have also themselves offered an amendment to the text in line 1206 which seems to be designed to guard against the evil of which the Senator from California complains. It appears to me if we are going to deal with this matter it ought to be dealt with in one proviso, so that we may not become complicated and the provision appear in different parts of the bill, perhaps in a contradictory way.

Mr. MCMILLAN. As the provision came to us in the bill as it passed the House there was an absolute appropriation of the sum inserted for the improvement of the Sacramento and Feather Rivers in California, $40,000, and the portion of the text stricken out by the committee directed the institution of legal proceedings upon the part of the Government of the United States to prohibit mining affecting these streams. After the word "mining," in line 1205, we inserted the words "hurtful to navigation." The text of the bill limited the expenditure of the money upon the part of the Secretary of War until he should be satisfied that hydraulic mining "has ceased on said rivers and their tributaries." That embraced all kinds of hydraulic mining. We were advised from sources that we thought were altogether reliable (the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], being a member of the committee and familiar with mining), that the text would embrace certain kinds of hydraulic mining which ought not to be prohibited.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Quartz mining.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Quartz mining and other kinds embraced in these terms. So we inserted the words "hurtful to navigation," to exclude the character of mining that ought not to be prohibited.

Then we thought it was not necessary that the Goverement should enter upon the prosecution of suits to prohibit or prevent these interruptions of the streams in California because they were entirely within the State and the State authorities perhaps would deal with them.

Those are the only reasons why we made the amendment here. We endeavored to arrive at what would be the best for the interests of the community affected by this improvement and for the mining interests in California. The Senator from California now offers this amendment and it is for the Senate to determine what it will do.

Mr. INGALLS. Do the committee adhere to their conclusion that this proviso directing the institution of legal proceedings shall be omitted from the bill?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the committee are not strenuous in regard to that, with the amendment offered by the Senator from California inserted after the word "mining," in line 1210.

Mr. INGALLS. That amendment as I understand appears elsewhere in the action of the committee, on page 62.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. That is a general provision.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course the general provision includes the particular provision.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This applies to these particular streams and is a particular provision.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment on page 62 covers all streams. Let me read the language on page 62:

Nor be so construed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will be seen that that limits it to some kinds of mining.

Mr. INGALLS. That is as I understand what the Senator from California desires. If this language on page 62 is to be agreed to by the Senate, why should the Senate recede from its action striking out this clause and retain an obnoxious provision, and burden it with an amendment that appears elsewhere in the action of the committee itself?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, I understand that the text here stricken out as amended by the Senator from California would only authorize prosecutions where the mining was by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator be good enough, in the light of that statement, to examine the language on page 62, and see whether it is not precisely what would occur if that amendment should be agreed to?

Mr. McMILLAN. The amendment reported on page 62 was made to conform to the change in the bill made by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate as we reported it.

Mr. INGALLS. May I ask the Senator from California who offered this amendment whether, if the amendment is agreed to, the language on page 62 does not accomplish exactly what he desires by his amendment to the paragraph proposed to be eliminated on page 50?

Mr. STANFORD. This is a question of very great importance to the State of California and one very difficult to deal with. It is evident to us in California that unless this particular kind of mining is stopped the navigation of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin Rivers will be destroyed, and not only that, but the great bay of San Francisco itself will be destroyed. It will be only a question of time.

A portion of the great bay called Suisun is now in such a condition that vessels passing through there have to seek for channels, whereas the time was when that water was navigable for vessels of any size, and where it was 30 or 40 feet deep the tules are now growing. I presume that portion of the bay is at least 5 by 15 miles in extent, and the tules are growing now in the center of that bay, and the small class of vessels that go up are sweeping the channel.

Mr. INGALLS. By tules growing does the Senator mean it is shoaled up and they are growing in the bay?

Mr. STANFORD. Yes, sir. The tule is a sort of rush. Then down below Suisun the bay is seriously injured, and it is only a question of time when it will be filled up by the volume of débris that is washed into the river from the mountains. Unless we are willing that the bay of San Francisco itself shall be destroyed we must stop that accumulation.

It seems to me that as in the harbor of San Francisco comes the commerce of the whole world, and out of it vessels go to all the different States, if interstate commerce and the commerce of the world are contemplated to be controlled and regulated by Congress the necessity for such control exists in this case. It is not protecting the harbor of San Francisco alone, but it is protecting commerce. It seems to me that there can be no question about the constitutional right of the Government to stop the destruction of that harbor.

It is folly to undertake to dredge out the river when tons are going in where one can possibly be taken out by the dredges. Therefore the accumulation ought to be stopped. That is the practical way to do this thing.

Now, we do not want to interfere with the other mining. There is a great deal of light mining that is of great value to the State. People live up in those mountains who raise fruit and pursue various other agricultural pursuits and callings of industry, and at times they mine. They mine with sluices sometimes, with what we call the long-tom, and various ways of washing. With that nobody wishes to interfere, because it would interfere with a great industry of the State, and one which is doing no special damage.

What we want to get at is to stop one kind of mining and not to interfere with the other kinds. All the delegation from that coast are agreed upon that point, and I offered the amendment out of great caution to accomplish the object so that we should not make a mistake. We do not want to interfere with any other kind of mining but this one particular kind, and the insertion of the words I propose can do no harm if it does no good.

Then the other portion stricken out by the committee, it will be seen, is applicable to the San Joaquin River, leaving the provision to apply only to the Sacramento and Feather Rivers. The part stricken out by the committee makes all the provisions applicable to the San Joaquin River as well.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Kansas will observe that in the item appropriating money and directing the institution of legal proceedings there is no enactment of a law. The enactment of the law is in the subsequent section, section 2. If the Senator from Kansas will give me his attention for a moment I will state that there is no provision enacting a law or making any legal provision in that item of appropriation; it is merely directing the Secretary of War to institute legal proceedings. The second section does enact a law in regard to this mining interfering with navigable streams. As the bill came to the Senate it comprehended all kinds of hydraulic mining. We were advised by the Senator from Nevada that the only kind of hydraulic mining which was injurious to these streams in any way was mining by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure. We excluded all kinds of mining hurtful to navigation. Perhaps the Senator understands fully the recommendation of the committee, and I shall not endeavor to explain the matter any further.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Senator from Kansas seems to think that there is something inconsistent in the several provisions of the bill; that is, that the provisions in sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are to some extent in conflict with the provisions on page 50.

Mr. INGALLS. No.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. That was his suggestion.

Mr. INGALLS. There was no suggestion about inconsistency at all. I said you are legislating about the same subject in three different portions of the bill, and now propose to insert another one in the amendment offered by the Senator from California on the same topic.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. These different provisions as we regard them are in perfect harmony the one with the other. In the first place, the provisions in sections 2 and 3 are penal provisions. They declare that it shall be unlawful to do certain things generally with reference to all the navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. What sections?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Sections 2 and 3. They are general provisions making it unlawful "to cast, throw, empty, or unlade, or cause, suffer, or procure to be cast, thrown, emptied, or unladen," &c., certain things described in any of the navigable waters of the United States. It is not limited to any particular rivers or the rivers in any particular State, but extends to any navigable waters of the United States, to rivers and harbors. There is a provision, however, that that shall not be so construed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining by water through pipes or used through nozzles under pressure, just as it is proposed to amend the provision on page 50. Then section 6 prescribes the penalty for violating the things which are forbidden in sections 2 and 3. That penalty is prescribed as follows:

> Every person, persons, or corporation offending against the provisions of this act shall, for each and every such offense, forfeit and pay a penalty of $250 (one-half, on conviction of the offender, to be paid to the informer), besides such further sum as may be found, in any action for the recovery of the penalty or penalties incurred under this act, to be the expense of making good the damage incurred, or of removing to a proper place the things deposited in violation of this act, &c.

That is one provision, and it is a general provision; it applies to all the rivers and harbors in the United States. It prescribes the penalty for doing the things which are prohibited by section 2.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not that include the Sacramento and Feather Rivers?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Certainly. But now we come back to the Sacramento, San Joaquin, and Feather Rivers; and what is proposed to be done there? Something further and different than is provided in the general provision, and what is it? It is that the Secretary of War may use a certain amount of money with reference to these three specific rivers in the State of California in preventing washing, sluicing, dumping or discharging the detritus, débris, or slickens caused by or arising from hydraulic mining; and then hydraulic mining is defined as proposed by the senior Senator from California in his amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. And instituting suits.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It authorizes the Secretary of War to institute suits; something that the Secretary of War could not do under the general provisions in sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6; so the provision on page 50 and the provisions in sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are not at all inconsistent. They are in harmony with each other.

This proposition of the senior Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD], if it shall be adopted and then the House text be adopted, simply places a power in the hands of the Secretary of War in reference to these three rivers to prevent this thing being done that he would not have in reference to rivers generally under the general provisions of sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6.

It all comes back to this simple proposition, in the first place, whether Congress has the power, under the commercial clause, "to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining," as defined by the proposed amendment of the senior Senator from California; and, secondly, whether, having the power, it is a proper exercise of that power to permit or authorize the Secretary of War to use a certain amount of this appropriation to prevent that thing. That is all there is to it. It seems to me that that is a reasonable proposition and one that ought to be adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. This involves a very great question, and is one that ought not to be passed by casually or informally or without due consideration.

If I understand the Senator from California correctly, the object and purpose and inevitable result of this amendment will be to practically destroy one of the great interests of California. For more than thirty years the people who are now engaged in carrying on the operations of mining by what is known as the hydraulic process have contributed enormously to the wealth not only of California but of the nation and the world. They acquired the territory in which they are now operating by purchase. They paid largely in excess of the minimum price of the public lands for that portion of the territory of the United States that is now the scene of their operations.

The enterprise in which these people are engaged is lawful. They entered upon it with the consent of the United States. They have invested enormous amounts of money in the construction of the works, the dams, the viaducts, the machinery by which they are extracting the gold from these gravel beds. And now, without notice, because some other industry is supposed to require protection, without recompense or compensation or equivalent to them for what you deprive them of and what you destroy, you propose to say that by the operations of this bill, nominally for the protection of the rivers and harbors of this country, that great industry shall be paralyzed and annihilated; that hereafter no man, no matter what he has invested, no matter if all his earthly possessions are invested in the lands he has bought and the machinery that he has constructed, if by reason of his operations any silt or deposit runs down into the remotest tributary of the Sacramento and Feather Rivers, shall be entitled thereafter to continue those operations.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Only where it is an obstacle to navigation.

Mr. INGALLS. It puts the whole subject into the hands of spies and informers, and it inflicts unjust penalties on these people, and gives half of those penalties to the sneak who goes and files his information before the district attorney. It is an invasion of private rights. It institutes a system that is abhorrent to American civilization, and in this peremptory and experimental way, without any recompense to the person whose property you destroy, proposes to obliterate one of the confessedly great industries of the Queen State of the Pacific coast; for what, Mr. President? Why, that some other industry may be stimulated or protected!

We are told here by many of the advocates of this bill that water ways are becoming rapidly extinct; that in competition with railway routes they are insufficient and antiquated; and yet here by a novel process and invention, as the Senator from Oregon assures us, of his own, something hitherto unattempted in legislation or in jurisprudence, you propose upon the pretext of excavating and dredging out the channel of a river away down in the lowlands of this State, to enable local commerce to be carried over it, the fruit and the wheat that is raised upon these low lands, to say to these people who are in these great elevations at an enormous expense, who at the invitation of the United States Government for thirty years have carried on their operations, "From this time you shall do so no more, under the penalty of heavy fine and imprisonment."

Mr. President, I hope before we get through with this bill that we shall have the opportunity of voting directly upon the sections from 2 to 7, and ascertain whether or not industries can be destroyed, whether legitimate enterprises can be extinguished, and whether upon the assumption that the navigable waters are under the control of the United States Government remote provinces are to be despoiled and people are to be told that upon no tributary or affluent of any navigable stream, hundreds of miles away from the point where the tide ebbs or flows or navigation is possible, shall any man put a tin pan with the refuse of a household or the garbage of a neighborhood without being subjected to the peril of having some sneak and spy and informer lodge complaint against him for the purpose of getting half the fine that is to be imposed upon him.

Not only that, but the bill goes further. Not only is the housewife or citizen not allowed to put anything in a creek, in a rivulet, in any little line of surface drainage, because forsooth it may wash down by the streams or the rainfalls hundreds of miles below into the navigable waters, but this bill forbids putting anything on shore. Let me read these extraordinary provisions.

SEC. 2. It shall not be lawful to cast, throw, empty, or unlade, or cause, suffer, or procure to be cast, thrown, emptied, or unladen—

With much multiplicity of verbiage—

into any port, road, roadstead, harbor, haven, navigable river, or other waters of the United States for the improvement of which Congress has already made, or may hereafter make, appropriations, or to dump, discharge, or wash, or cause to be dumped, discharged, or washed, from any mine or mineral land or bank, tailings, bowlders, gravel, clay, earth, or débris into any navigable waters or rivers for the improvement of which Congress has made or may make appropriations, or into any tributaries, branch, or affluent of such waters or rivers—

No matter where they may be located, at what point or what remote distance they may empty into the channel of this navigable stream—or to deposit or place, wash, dump, or discharge, or cause, suffer, or procure to be deposited or placed, or washed, dumped, or discharged, any ballast, stone, slate, gravel, earth, slack, rubbish, wreck, filth, slabs, edgings, sawdust, slag, cinders, or other refuse or mill-waste, or gravel, tailings, bowlders, clay, earth, or débris, from mines or mineral lands, in any place or situation on shore where the same shall be liable to be washed into any navigable waters, either by ordinary or high tides, or by storms or floods—

As if that were not enough—or otherwise, and become—

Not "be," but "become"— an obstruction to navigation.

Mr. President, I am as firm an advocate for the extension of the national authority over all territory of this Union, I presume, as any Senator who has ever been or is now here. I am in favor of extending national dominion everywhere in the interest of justice and the promotion of the public welfare; but this is the most extraordinary innovation, the most unprecedented invasion of rights, not only of States but of individuals, of neighborhoods, and communities that ever has been presented for the sanction of this body.

This extends to all affluents of any navigable stream! Take the Missouri River that from its headwaters down to the Gulf of Mexico is 4,500 miles long, the longest navigable stream on the face of the globe, beside which the Nile and the Danube and the Plate are infants. And yet under this bill because down at the passes of the Mississippi are navigable waters that have been made the subject of appropriation by the United States, any sneak or spy or informer in the far-remote regions of Montana, in the Yellowstone Park, away up on the very confines of the British possessions can lodge complaint against any citizen of the United States, not of putting the refuse of a saw-mill into one of affluents of the Missouri River 4,000 miles away from where it discharges itself into the Gulf, but of depositing on the shore of any of these affluents of the Missouri River in Montana or Wyoming the débris of a saw-mill, the tailings of a mine, because, forsooth, it may at some time, no one knows when or where or how, not by the ordinary progress of the water through the channels of the stream, but by some flood or rainfall or water-spout or otherwise be washed down into the stream, and thence through its circuitous meanderings and wanderings through the great empire that lies below lodge somewhere within the limits of the water to which appropriations are made by the Government of the United States and become—not "be" but "become"—at some time or other an obstruction to navigation.

This is what the Senator from Oregon claims as his own particular and special invention. He has with assiduity and industry, unwearied through a long term of public service, urged this matter upon the attention of the committees in both Houses, and has at last secured the adoption by one of the principal committees here of these provisions of this bill. The Senator from Oregon is entitled certainly to a patent for novelty for his invention. The only wonder to me is that a bill so far-reaching and monstrous, so unnecessary, so in violation of all the previous practice of this Government, so susceptible of abuse, and in every way such an invasion of the rights of States and individuals should have received the sanction of the committees in both Houses of Congress.

The junior Senator from Oregon attempted to correct me because I ventured to suggest that the proposition offered by the senior Senator from California was included in a general provision of this bill, and he said that the provisions in sections 2 to 7 were general in their terms; that they applied to the entire subject, and created a new penal code for the purpose of preventing persons from interfering with the navigable waters of the United States, and then attempted to instruct me to the effect that the provision that the committee have eliminated on page 50 and proposed to be amended by the Senator from California had reference to a particular locality, an expenditure that would be not included in the general provisions of sections 2 to 7. I listened with great interest, and I fail to discern how, if the language in section 2 shall be adopted, and how, if section 6 shall be adopted, it will not be possible under the provisions of those two sections to punish any miners that may hereafter in California on the headwaters of the Feather River and its tributaries deposit their slickens and detritus in the valleys of those streams.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Under the general provision of course they may be punished; but in the absence of a special provision the Secretary of War would not be authorized to take measures to prevent the thing being done.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill declares in line 1204 that the balance of said unexpended money shall not be used until the Secretary of War is "satisfied that hydraulic mining hurtful to navigation has ceased on said rivers and their tributaries;" and yet the Senator would leave the impression that there will be a compulsory obligation on the part of the Secretary of War to spend this money, and that he himself, in addition to the other penal sections of this bill, shall be endowed with special functions to punish the miners on the headwaters of the Feather River because they are conducting their operations as they have been for thirty years and whom you now propose to annihilate and destroy.

It may be that the Sacramento and Feather Rivers are not navigable streams; it may be that they are not streams that would come into the category that is named in section 6, and it is possible that by some mysterious process they would be exempt from the penal provisions of section 6; but unless that is the case you are simply imposing additional, unnecessary, cruel, and unjust restrictions upon these men engaged now in a lawful enterprise for the benefit of some other industry in the State of California with which I am not entirely acquainted.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Does the Senator from Kansas hold that under the general provisions of section 2 the Secretary of War or the President of the United States or anybody else would have any power to prevent the obstruction of these rivers?

Mr. INGALLS. He is authorized not to spend any money until it is prevented, and you put the machinery to prevent it in the hands of a proper officer of the Government; and after you have done so you want to arm the Secretary of War with additional weapons, to give him more ammunition, and enable him to inflict superfluous penalties on these people and select them for a chosen assault over and above all those who may be the subject of the general law.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Senator from Kansas is coming around evidently to the position I occupy, which is this, that under the general provision in section 2 a person violating the provisions of this section may be indicted and fined; but there is no power in the Secretary of War or anybody else to take measures to prevent the thing being done. Now it is true—and there is the difference in the two propositions—that the proposition is on page 50 of this bill to give that power, not given in the general provision, to the Secretary of War with reference to these three rivers. That may all be wrong—I do not think it is myself—but it simply provides what I suggested in the first place, that the proposition on page 50 is to enlarge the powers of the Secretary of War, to give him a new and different and separate and distinct power from that which he possesses under section 2. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. STANFORD. I propose to address myself for a few moments to considering the specific amendment under consideration, and what there may be in section 2 touching the headwaters of the Yellowstone I leave out.

This section, you will observe, confines itself to a particular kind of mining. All others it leaves alone. And why the Senator from Kansas should object to this particular amendment since he has such a jealous care of the rights of the miners I do not know, because this amendment only affects a particular class and a very limited number. I am very glad that he is so jealous of the personal rights of individuals. I myself am a stickler for the rights of individuals, and hold that this Government should never impair their rights except upon just compensation when their property is taken for public use.

I am not aware that the Government of the United States, in making their deeds for the mining lands, have ever said that the grantees had the right to do anything with other Government land or with the rights of other individuals. There is no clause in them that they may wash down the débris upon individual farms all over the State. There is no clause there giving the right to put their débris upon any other man's property or upon any other acre of the Government of the United States itself. If there had been any such thing as that, it would be high time for the Government to condemn this property and pay just compensation. Are they to stand by and see the harbor of San Francisco destroyed, with the navigation of the San Joaquin and the Sacramento, two of the most important rivers in the United States, together forming navigable streams north and south of about 400 miles through a magnificent country?

What may be the condition of the general clauses of section 2 I am not prepared to discuss; but we want to limit the class of mining that is to be affected. We take from the miners no right that they now possess as against any other individuals. They have patents for their land from the Government as patents are issued for farming land, and a miner has no more right under his patent to destroy the land of the farmer than the farmer has to destroy the mining interests. Each of them holds certain rights specified in their deeds; and if the miner has bought lands the deeds for which do not have clauses enough to protect him and to allow him to do all that he pleases, that was his mistake at the time, and he had better apply to the Government to correct it. But I do not know anything in those patents that authorizes a miner to destroy the harbor or the rivers of California, or to destroy the farming lands of the farmers along the banks of these streams, which are of far more value than all the hydraulic mining in the State put together is now or ever will be in time to come.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD].

Mr. VEST. Let it be read.

The SECRETARY. In the words proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Commerce, after the word "mining," at the end of line 1210, it is proposed to insert:

By water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure.

Mr. HEARST. Is the amendment I sent up in order now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not. The Chair will inform the Senator from California that his amendment belongs to another portion of the bill and not to this.

Mr. HEARST. But I want it added here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is already an amendment to an amendment now pending, and a further amendment would not be in order at this time. The question is on the amendment of the other Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Now the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] can offer his amendment.

Mr. HEARST. I offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from California that his amendment as offered applies in words to page 62, after a certain line and after a certain word.

Mr. HEARST. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Page 62 has not been reached. We are now on page 50.

Mr. HEARST. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, section 2, line 42, after the word "pressure," it is proposed to insert "and against mountain sides or natural banks."

Mr. INGALLS. It seems impossible to penetrate Bœotian darkness. The Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] desires to add these words which were to be inserted on that paragraph at the end of the words which have been inserted in this by his colleague; and I suppose he has a right to do it if we can obtain the necessary machinery at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has sent no such amendment to the desk yet.

Mr. INGALLS. I respectfully state that he has. He says he wants these words to go in this amendment that is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. STANFORD. I want these words, which occur also on page 62, but I do not want to confound the two.

Mr. INGALLS. I speak now about the Senator's colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain any motion for amendment which the Senator from California or the Senator from Kansas makes.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. As I understahd the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST], he wishes more thoroughly and more correctly to describe the character of mining of which the other Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] complains, to wit, hydraulic mining. His amendment goes to the point that the penalty in this clause about to be passed shall not apply to hydraulic mining.

But there is a vast amount of hydraulic mining carried on in California on small banks where no very considerable amount of débris can ever get into the streams, certainly none that would injure the navigation of those streams. Nearly all the placer mining of California is carried on through pipes and under hydraulic pressure; but the banks are very small banks, whereas the hydraulic mining proper as understood in California means banks ranging from fifty to three or four hundred feet in height and parts of which are constantly thrown into the gulches and washed toward the streams. It is to define exactly what hydraulic mining is and in connection with the amendment offered by the senior Senator from California that the junior Senator from California offers this amendment, more correctly to describe hydraulic mining, as I said before. He wants to offer it in this place and also in the other place. Wherever hydraulic mining is referred to in this bill he wishes to define what hydraulic mining means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment just adopted it is proposed to add:

"And against mountain sides or natural banks;" so as to read:

"If he be not so satisfied, he is hereby instructed to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the washing, sluicing, dumping, or discharging detritus, débris, or slickens, caused by or arising from hydraulic mining, by water used through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure and against mountain sides or natural banks, into either of said rivers or any of its tributaries, or into the San Joaquin River or any of its tributaries, or in or to such place or situation from which such detritus, débris, or slickens may be liable to be washed or carried by storms or floods into either of said rivers or tributaries; and he is hereby instructed to use out of said sum as much as may be necessary for said purpose."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee to strike out the clause as amended.

Mr. TELLER. The text as now amended is a good deal better than when it came from the other House. I do not myself believe it ought to pass at all. I think we ought to sustain the committee in striking this out, although if we are to have it in the text at all, as I said before it is improved by the two amendments which have been put on.

Whatever may have been said about this, it is a contest in California between the miners on the one hand and the agriculturists on the other that has excited the people of that State for some years, and I do not believe myself that under the pretense of saving navigable rivers from being filled up it is the duty of the United States Government to commence prosecutions against these people in the hills of California.

I am opposed to this provision. I am in favor of sustaining the committee in striking it out. I think all these questions must be and ought to be left to the State to settle for themselves. They are questions concerning private rights; and although this may ultimately injure the navigation of the rivers and very likely it will, that is not the question. It is a controversy, I repeat, between citizens of California first as to whether they shall have a right to wash down the banks and the débris going down the rivers and overflowing the farms and destroying them, as they say it does by raising the bed of the river and thus creating floods—whether the miners shall be interdicted in that work or whether they shall be allowed to continue it.

This provision has not any place in this bill, in the first place, any more than section 2 and section 3, as I shall attempt to show when we come to those provisions, and it ought to be stricken out. When we come to sections 2 and 3 I propose to express my opinion as to those provisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HALE. Just what is the question now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee striking out from line 1207 to 1217, inclusive, as amended.

Mr. HALE. The committee, as I understand, are in favor of striking out the clause that has been amended.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEARST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, if I understand the question, it is upon the committee amendment, that strikes out all that part of the bill between the word "tributaries," in lines 1206 and 1207, and the word "purpose," inclusive, in line 1217, as that House clause has been amended this morning by various propositions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine is correct.

Mr. HALE. The committee propose to strike all that out. That leaves this subject-matter with the money to be expended, provided "the Secretary of War be satisfied that hydraulic mining hurtful to navigation has ceased on said rivers and their tributaries;" but strikes out all the provisions directing the General Government to seek out and prosecute the men who are engaged in their vocation on the upper banks of these rivers. If that is the case I, for one, shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. STANFORD. As I understand, the proposition is to adopt the amendment of the committee, which means to strike out all that portion which we have been endeavoring to amend. I take it that Senators here are in favor of restoring the text with such amendments as have been adopted this morning. Therefore those who are in favor of leaving that clause in as amended will vote against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HALE. You will vote "nay."

Mr. STANFORD. Yes.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when the name of Mr. ALDRICH was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. I do not know how he would vote if present. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] being present, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 19; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1227, to increase the appropriation for "improving the mouth of the Columbia River, Oregon," from $150,000 to $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1247, after the word "improvement," to insert "including necessary repairs of works at Omaha, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, and Nebraska City;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement, including necessary repairs of works at Omaha, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, and Nebraska City, $500,000.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment of the committee I see names certain works at Omaha, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, and Kansas City. The money appropriated for the Missouri River is not expended to any considerable extent for the purpose of navigation, but for the purpose of protecting the shores against the dangers of erosion where important cities are located or where bridges cross the stream, so that the channel of the river may not leave towns and bridges so that they will be unavailable. I do not think there is any regular navigation on the Missouri River above Kansas City. Now and then a boat bound for the upper waters of the Yellowstone goes by in the spring and returns again in the fall if it can; but the flotilla that is employed in the commerce of the Upper Missouri remains there during the entire year, and navigation of the Missouri River is practically abandoned. There is a railroad on both sides of the river from its junction with the Mississippi up as far as Omaha and perhaps above on the west bank, and quite to a distance into Dakota Territory on the east, so that the facilities of transportation are abandoned; and as the stream is so tortuous and its channel so shifting, I doubt whether it can ever be made navigable or used as an auxiliary for transportation. But there are many other points besides those amended in this amendment where money has been expended for the purposes of protecting bridges and the wharves of cities which ought to be not certainly excluded by the language of this amendment.

I should understand if these places are specially retained in the bill that there is a sort of a direction by Congress that the money or the bulk of it shall be expended at these places. That is unjust; it is invidious, and it is unnecessary also, and I do not know on what information the committee acted in putting these points in the bill. The city of Saint Joseph, that is about 75 miles above Kansas City, is a point where a large amount of money has been expended; a bridge crosses the river there; and if the channel were changed materially that bridge would be left inland, and it would not be available for the crossing of the trains and the wagon traffic that now go over it.

The same may be said of Atchison. There has been $120,000 spent at Atchison for the purpose of protecting the banks against the erosion of the currents. And if the purpose of the committee was—and I ask the Senator from Missouri on that point—if the intention of the committee was to exclude these other points, it is certainly an act of great injustice, because there is liable to be at any moment a break in the revetment works that have been placed at other points on the river besides those here named; and this fund which is appropriated ought to be at the disposition of the commission from time to time to expend wherever it may be necessary. Sometimes after a flood in that stream it rises 28 or 30 feet and then recedes, and the quicksands of the bank being saturated, whenever the water recedes, failing to receive support from the column that is in the stream, the banks rapidly cave in and disappear, and then boats that are employed on the river for driving piles and laying basket-work and mattresses ought to be in such a condition that they can go wherever it may be necessary to expend this money. It seems to me that it is an unjust exclusion of points that are just as much entitled to the benefits of this appropriation as those that are named.

I should like to hear from the Senator from Missouri, who I suppose took charge of this matter in the committee, or from the chairman of the committee, if there is any particular reason why this fund should not be disposed of as it has been heretofore at the points on the river where it is necessary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The committee received their information from the report of the engineers and from the report of the Missouri River Commission, and from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] who is a member of the committee, and the Senator's colleague [Mr. PLUMB], if not the Senator himself. I am not aware whether the Senator imparted any information on that subject to the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It was not the intention as I understand it of the committee to exclude any point which would be recommended by the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. PLUMB. I would suggest an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not know whether the bill as printed contains all the amendments which were made by the committee.

Mr. VEST. There is a mistake in the print of the bill. The amendment was changed in the committee by striking out the words "repairs of."

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment be read as it ought to be.

Mr. VEST. It ought to read "including necessary works."

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amendment commences on line 1247. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, page 51, in line 1247, after the word "improvement," insert "including necessary repairs of works at Omaha, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, and Nebraska City;" and in line 1250, after the word "dollars," to strike out "without the intervention of the Missouri River Commission" and insert "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, estimates, and recommendations of the Missouri River Commission;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement, including necessary repairs of works at Omaha, Fort Leavenworth Reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, and Nebraska City, $500,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, estimates, and recommendations of the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. McMILLAN. The committee agreed upon an amendment striking out the word "the," in line 1252, before the word "plans;" and after "plans" inserting the word "and;" and, in line 1253, striking out the words "and recommendations of" and inserting in lieu thereof "to be furnished by;" so that the amendment will read:

To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with plans and estimates to be furnished by the Missouri River Commission.

That is the amendment as it was agreed upon by the committee, I think on the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. VEST. Also, in lines 1247 and 1248, the words "repairs of" should be stricken out; so as to read:

Including necessary works at Omaha, Fort Leavenworth reservation, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. The words "repairs of," I think, should not be omitted, because there are works at Omaha and Fort Leavenworth reservation, as I know, and also at Kansas City. Arrow Rock and Nebraska City I am not acquainted with.

Mr. VEST. My idea in striking out the words "repairs of" was that "necessary works" would include all necessary repairs, a more comprehensive term.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

Mr. VEST. It would be best for us not to say there had been work done at these points. Saint Joseph is a point that ought to be included, and I so voted; but it has been omitted.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the word "Atchison" may be inserted after the word "Omaha."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, without objection.

Mr. VEST. The report of the commission which I have in my hand, dated April 30, 1886, shows that there was an unexpended balance of $3,017.07 on April 30, 1886, for the work at Saint Joe, and in the report of the commission, contained in the report of the Secretary of War, volume 2, part 4, the commission say:

It was found, however, that at Saint Joseph, Mo., a cut-off was threatened, which, if made, would have a far-reaching and injurious effect upon the stream, and that moreover there was a considerable amount of work there in place, executed under former appropriations, which, if left to itself, would be lost. These two circumstances combined seemed to justify making an exception in this case to the general rules established, and it was accordingly determined to complete the revetment of the banks in this vicinity. One or the other circumstance alone occurs elsewhere, but does not, in the judgment of the commission, justify a departure from the systematic plan proposed.

That is, to improve by reaches, commencing from Kansas City and going down to the mouth. There was a great deal of criticism in another portion of the Capitol on the fact that the report of the Missouri River Commission shows that $259,000 were expended at Kansas City. There is a very simple explanation of that. Major Suter, who has had charge of the river for several years, says in his report here that he divided the river into two sections, one extending 800 miles from Saint Louis, at the mouth of the river, to Kansas City. The distance from the mouth of the river to Fort Benton is 2,500 miles, which would leave about 1,700 miles from Kansas City to Sioux City.

Mr. CONGER. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to the closing part of the paragraph of the bill under consideration. It would seem not important to put in any of the places, because as the committee propose to amend the clause it reads:

To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with plans and estimates to be furnished by the Missouri River Commission.

I think we might safely leave the places where there are to be repairs made or new work commenced for any of these purposes to the commissioners hereafter as we have heretofore. The places that are named, or any others that the special attention of the committee may be desired to be called to, are not objectionable, but I do not think it is necessary to name them to secure the expenditure of sufficient money for repairs.

Mr. VEST. I will come to that point in a moment or two. The distances are laid down as follows:

Upon assuming their duties, the commission found that a continuous survey of the river had been made from its mouth to Fort Pierre, Dak., a distance of 1,174 miles, and also from the mouth of Sun River, at the head of the falls, to Stubbs Ferry, near Helena, a distance of 130.7 miles, leaving unsurveyed the portions extending from Fort Pierre to the mouth of Sun River, a distance estimated at about 1,390 miles, and from Stubbs Ferry to the headwaters of the Missouri, at Three Forks, a distance estimated at 73 miles. They found that the head of navigation was at Fort Benton, situated about 250 miles below the headwaters, and about 2,519 miles above the mouth of the river.

In other words, the Missouri River is navigable 2,519 miles.

That works of improvement had been executed at various points from Saint Charles, Mo., 25 miles above the mouth, to Kipp's Rapids, 58 miles below Fort Benton, besides some small works constructed in 1880 above the falls.

For convenience of administration, the river had been divided into two districts, the first district extending from the mouth to Sioux City, a distance of 803 miles, and the second from Sioux City to Fort Benton, a distance of about 1,716 miles. The division was an artificial one, made simply for convenience, there being no marked change in the character of the river for a long distance above and below Sioux City.

It is not material under these divisions how far it is from Kansas City to Sioux City. The second division extends from Sioux City to Fort Benton, and the first division extends from the mouth of the river to Sioux City.

It is true this commission has expended two hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars at Kansas City for two reasons given in the report. The first is that Kansas City is by far the most important city on the river, the population being now in the neighborhood of 140,000, and increasing at the rate of 10,000 a year—almost unparalleled in the history of this country.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator state in a general way the character of this improvement?

Mr. VEST. The river at Kansas City is performing one of its ordinary tricks, for it is in the habit of doing it. It commenced bearing the full volume of its current, striking the southern bank of the river just above the city. It then dashed out in a cross-current, striking the middle pier of the bridge there and endangering the whole structure. Where it struck the river, just above Kansas City, it seems to threaten a cut-off, which would destroy virtually navigation below the city for a considerable distance. It became so extremely dangerous that great exertions were made by the people of the city and the municipal authorities to call the attention of the board of engineers to this improvement, and various amounts have been appropriated since I have been upon the Committee on Commerce from time to time for the purpose of meeting this particular thing.

The report of the Missouri River Commission shows that they took Kansas City as the initial point, because, as Major Suter says, "I mean to work down-stream." Major Suter says the improvement must go down-stream instead of up, and that he took Kansas City not because it was exactly half way down the first section, but because it furnished a base of supplies, being a large city, to get all the material and men that were needed. I will not read in extenso.

Now as to the points above this of which the Senator from Michigan has spoken, Major Suter goes on and shows that hitherto work has been done at the following points on the Missouri River, under different appropriations, during the last ten years:

Saint Chares, Mo., 25 miles, 1880; Cedar City, Mo., 147 miles, 1879; Glasgow, Mo., 226.5 miles, 1879; Lexington, Mo., 319 miles, 1880; Kansas City, Mo., 386 miles, 1879; Fort Leavenworth, Kans., 419 miles, 1878; Atchison, Kans., 446 miles, 1878; Saint Joseph, Mo., 479.5 miles, 1876; Brownville, Nebr., 580 miles, 1880; Eastport, Iowa, and Nebraska City, Nebr., 608.5 miles, 1876; Plattsmouth, Nebr., 638 miles, 1880; Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr., 668 miles, 1878; Sioux City, Iowa, 803 miles, 1878.

Senators appeared before the Committee on Commerce when we had this portion of the bill under consideration, conspicuously the Senator from Nebraska, and stated that unless the Missouri River Commission paid some attention to the work already done at these different points the work there would be totally worthless, and would be washed away in the coming freshets. The Senator from Kansas to my right [Mr. PLUMB] appeared, and alleged the necessity in the name of the Government for an improvement of the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, that if it were not improved and improved at once it would result in great damage, irremediable damage, to the Government property at that point.

For that reason we specified certain points upon the river and we took those points, not seeking to discriminate against any but these points that were brought to our attention where the works were in danger and where it was necessary that there should be new work done at once. There was not the slighest idea, and especially on my part, to omit Saint Joseph, because Saint Joseph is the third city in the State of Missouri. I inferred, however, from the report of the commission that the largest part of the work at Saint Joe, if not all, had been done, leaving an unexpended balance of $3,000; and there is an unexpended balance of $50,000 from the old appropriation at Kansas City. The appropriation for the whole river from the mouth up to Sioux City is $500,000 I confess that my object in putting in this clause specifically was to call the attention of the Missouri River people to the matter.

Mr. TELLER. I find for the upper river: "Improving Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton: Continuing improvement, $80,000," making $580,000 for the whole river.

Mr. VEST. I am not speaking about that part of the river.

Mr. TELLER. I thought you were speaking of the whole river.

Mr. VEST. Oh, no. The commission divided the river into two sections for improvement purposes, one extending from the mouth to Sioux City and the other from Sioux City to Fort Benton, which is the head of navigation; but I am not directing my remarks at all to the upper section of the river.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if the committee considered carefully the relative proportions to be established between the mouth of the river and Sioux City and between Sioux City and Fort Benton. My information is that the chief navigation of this river, so far as steam craft are concerned, is between Sioux City and Fort Benton.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is a separate appropriation for that.

Mr. ALLISON. That is just what I am directing my attention to. As stated by the Senator from Kansas, there is comparatively little navigation between Sioux City and the mouth of the Missouri. So I wish to suggest to the committee that the sum of $500,000 should be reduced to $400,000 and $100,000 added to the appropriation for the navigation of the Upper Missouri. I am informed that that is a more just arrangement for the benefit of the navigation of the whole river than to expend this large sum between Sioux City and the mouth. I suggest that to the committee, and I hope they will agree to it.

Mr. VEST. I hope not. The Missouri River Commission made this report in regard to the expenditure on the river:

It is the opinion of the commission that the work, while in the experimental stage, should be carried on under annual appropriations of $1,000,000 each, and they accordingly recommend for the coming year for this portion of the river—an appropriation of $1,000,000.

That is, from Sioux City to the mouth—

The House of Representatives instead of giving a million dollars appropriated only $500,000. Now if the Senator from Iowa will listen to Major Suter's report I think possibly it is a better argument than I could make although I had all the time that was necessary before me with regard to this question.

He gives the two opinions in reference to the improvement of this river, which I confess is a very difficult problem on account of the peculiar nature of its banks and the enormous length of the river, itself as great as the Mississippi River. Indeed by an arbitrary nomenclature the name of Mississippi was given to another stream, although the Mississippi proper takes its color and character, I will not say from the Missouri River, but there is a continuation of the lower river up through Missouri and between Nebraska and Iowa. You might as well have called any other stream the Mississippi as what is now called the Upper Mississippi, because it is a different stream in its character and in the color of its water, and distinct from the Mississippi River proper. The Missouri is really the Mississippi. But I want to read what Major Suter says in regard to his idea about the improvement of this river. It is not very long and it is very succinct and distinct.

It remains to announce the principles by which they have been governed—in making the allotments for carrying on the works and which they propose to follow in the future, where the appropriation bills leave such allotments to their discretion. The commission find that among the people most interested in the improvement of the Missouri River there are two radically different views as to the proper method of distributing the appropriations. On the one hand it is held that the first and most important object of the appropriations is to check the ravages now being suffered by private, corporate, and municipal property on the banks; that an appropriation made by law to apply to a long reach of river should be distributed somewhat uniformly over it, due attention being paid to the relative value of the interests endangered at different points; that the commerce now actually existing upon the river is of small importance, and that works for its exclusive benefit may well be deferred until the tangible property now visible be secured from injury. Naturally the persons holding these views have most frequently and most vigorously made themselves known to the commission.

That is, the commission—

On the other hand, it is held by the commission that the appropriations are intended as a business investment made by the Government with the object with which any other capitalist enters upon a great enterprise, namely, a return of the capital together with interest; that the primary object of the improvement is to deepen the channel and thus to provide cheap through transportation for freight by which the country may be developed and the money paid out be finally returned to the Treasury of the United States; that the cost of protecting any portion of the bank from erosion is so great that it is only in exceptional cases that the annual interest upon the investment does not exceed the annual loss without protection; that while it is true that there is but a small amount of commerce upon the river at this time, the object is to increase that commerce, and that if that object fails the whole scheme is a financial failure whether the destruction of property may have been stopped or not; and, finally, that to distribute the appropriations over numerous points separated from each other by long distances is to insure greater expense in the use of plant and in administration, to postpone the realization of any benefits from the partially completed improvement, and probably also to have insufficient means at all points, with the disastrous results that have heretofore attended that policy.

Holding these views, the commission have determined to concentrate their means and to apply them where there is the best promise of obtaining substantial benefits to the general commerce of the United States, at the earliest practicable date, and before the entire completion of the improvement. Evidently useful results can be most quickly obtained by improving the lower end of the river, providing an outlet to the Mississippi. Engineering necessities require that the work should progress down-stream. The initial point must, therefore, be at some distance above the mouth.

The commission have selected Kansas City, 386 miles above the mouth, because it is the first important commercial center to be met with in proceeding up-stream. They would have preferred an initial point at a less distance from the mouth than 386 miles, but believing that no very great benefit would be conferred upon the commerce of the United States before the improvement shall extend from the mouth to Kansas City, they have allowed the following considerations to control, namely, that it was desirable to begin the work near a good base of supplies, and that some detached work had already been done here under previous appropriations which could be utilized as part of a general scheme of improvement.

The latter portion of the appropriation for the portion of the river below Sioux City has been allotted to the works to be executed at and below Kansas City. The programme which the commission have adopted is to make the improvement continuous, working down-stream from Kansas City to the mouth of the river, applying all the means placed at their disposal, as far as possible, to this purpose, protecting land, and building up new banks as this becomes necessary for the preservation of the channel.

This is the scheme of the commission, and it is in my judgment the only feasible one.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a scheme based on an appropriation of a million of dollars.

Mr. VEST. They only get $500,000.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true; but as the debate discloses that a large portion of the $500,000 will be required to protect and repair and care for works already completed at different points along the banks between Sioux City and the mouth, it seems to me that if we are not by sufficient appropriation to enter upon a plan of improvement of this river, beginning as the commission suggests, it is better to divert a portion of the sum now proposed to the Upper Missouri, in order so far as possible to make that navigable to where steam navigation now is. That is all I suggest.

I quite agree with the commission that if Congress will appropriate a sufficient sum of money, beginning at Kansas City, if you please, or a place lower down, and perfect and complete the improvement as it goes along, that would be very well; but evidently this appropriation of $500,000 is a mere bagatelle for the Missouri River on the plan adopted by the commission and suggested for the improvement of the river.

Mr. VEST I heartily agree with the Senator from Iowa that this appropriation ought to be $1,000,000, and yet I suppose if I had made it $1,000,000, as I have the misfortune to be a member of the Committee on Commerce, I should have been accused of venal rapacity or rapacious venality, I do not know which. My friend from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has made that charge against every member of the committee, indiscriminately and promiscuously.

I did not increase the appropriations for the State of Missouri a single dollar. The whole State gets $17,500 of the enormous amount that the State needs. Having a horror and dread of the eloquence of the Senator from Kansas, I was so modest and prudent as to leave even this great work of the improvement of the Missouri River at the amount placed on it by the House. The bill was increased in our committee $3,400,000. I preferred to get $500,000, though it was not half enough, for the Missouri River and $2,150,000 for the Mississippi, than to pile up appropriations and increase them so as to bring on a veto and lose the whole bill. That is the honest truth. I thought I had better take what was in sight. I find that other gentlemen were not quite so modest, and that they increased appropriations for their States until the bill as it came into the Senate at $18,400,000 will go out of the Senate at $19,000,000. I do not know what the President will do with it. I know what I would do with it if I were not bound now by instructions from the Legislature, as is my colleague, absolutely to vote appropriations for the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. But for that fact I should vote against this bill, which is one of the most objectionable I have ever known.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri is mistaken in saying the bill was reported at $19,000,000. It was at $18,000,000.

Mr. VEST. I did not say it came out of committee at $19,000,000. I said it would leave the Senate at $19,000,000. I say it came out of committee with $18,400,000, and I am not more than a few dollars out of the way, and by the time we are through with it at the rate we have progressed, putting back every decrease and increasing a great many appropriations already made, it will leave the Senate with $19,000,000.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa that the Missouri River should have a million dollars, and unquestionably I should have put it in if I had not thought I was endangering the $500,000 already granted.

The Senator from Iowa, although he admits the appropriation is not enough by half, wants to take $100,000 off the lower river and put it on the upper river. That is not fair. In order to improve the upper river he ought not to rob the lower river. We do not expect to put a large number of steamboats on the lower river. There are two packets running now from Kansas City to the mouth. I do not know that there will be another steamer ever put upon it. I hope there will be. But what we want at Kansas City and what the constituents of the Senator from Kansas want is a line of barges, if possible, that can be run down that river carrying grain to the Lower Mississippi. We have attempted that, and we have no lack of capital or enterprise; but we found that the Missouri was in such a condition that even barges could not be run down it; and, in my judgment, the only way in which the barge system can be successfully inaugurated there is under the system which is advocated by Major Suter, to improve that river by reaches and not at sporadic points.

I was opposed myself, I will say frankly, to granting any specific appropriation for points upon the river; but, as I have stated, Senators came to the committee and said works would be destroyed. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] said that the Government property at Leavenworth was being endangered for the want of improvement, and he felt it to be a duty to call the attention of the commission, while they were not asked to give up their general system, to the necessity of preserving the improvements already made upon that stream.

In regard to the barge system I will state here parenthetically, to show what would be the importance of a well-organized and regular barge system upon the Missouri River, one fact within my personal knowledge. During the late strikes upon the railroads in the State of Missouri the rates of transportation upon the Missouri Pacific, belonging to Mr. Gould, were enormously increased. Mr. Philip Armour, who has a large establishment at Kansas City, just across the Missouri line and within the limits of the State of Kansas but virtually for all business purposes within the corporate limits of Kansas City, Mo., determined that rather than submit to these enormous rates he would fit out a barge and I think possibly three barges. He did so and loaded them with his commodities and sent them down the river and they made their way to the mouth. The fact that a man with his capital had determined not to submit to these enormous charges by the railroads, but that he would resort to some sort of water transportation, brought that company to their senses and they immediately reduced their rates.

I do not mean to say that we shall ever have again the forty or fifty packets plying on the Missouri River that we had years ago, but if we can even with this small appropriation of $500,000 get that river into such a condition that we can get barges on it to carry grain down to the Mississippi to its mouth, it is all we ask, and I hope my friend from Iowa will not take $100,000 off an appropriation which he says now is 50 per cent. under what it should be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri propose an amendment?

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Kansas, whom I do not see, has an amendment prepared which he desires to offer.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggested the addition of Atchison.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That will be inserted, and the Senator's colleague [Mr. PLUMB] suggested Saint Joseph.

Mr. VEST. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Minnesota to propose an amendment from the committee. Will he state it again?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir. In line 1252, I move to strike out the word "the" before "plans" and after the word "plans" to insert "and," and in line 1253, after the word "estimates," to strike out "and recommendations of" and insert in lieu thereof "to be furnished by;" so as to read:

Five hundred thousand dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with plans and estimates to be furnished by the Missouri River Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST. In the same paragraph, line 1247, after the word "necessary," I move to strike out the words "repairs of works" and insert "work;" so as to read:

Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement, including necessary work at Omaha, Fort Leavenworth reservation, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then the words "Atchison and Saint Joseph" are inserted.

Mr. VEST. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on the whole amendment in the clause from line 1246 to line 1254 as amended, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "improvement," in line 1247, insert:

Including necessary work at Omaha, Atchison, Saint Joseph, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, and Nebraska City.

And after the word "dollar," in line 1250, to strike out:

Without the intervention of the Missouri River Commission.

And insert:

To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with plans and estimates to be furnished by the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to add, after "Nebraska City," "Plattsmouth and Brownville," where works have been carried on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. There is another amendment which I propose, in line 1247 to strike out "repairs of works."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been agreed to and was so reported. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that include the addition of the committee in lines 1251, 1252, 1253, and 1254?

Mr. VEST. It does.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the chairman of the committee would inform the Senate in what condition this leaves the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. VEST. They have charge of the river.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be inclined to doubt that. If they have charge of it they have not charge of the money and they have not any charge of the operations, because they are under the control of the Secretary of War "without the intervention of the Missouri River Commission," those words being omitted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. They are stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. But it is to be "in accordance with plans, estimates, and recommendations of the Missouri River Commission."

Mr. VEST. That is the ordinary language used in regard to the Mississippi River.

Mr. INGALLS. Their functions are not impaired then by this bill?

Mr. VEST. Not at all. I will explain to the Senator from Kansas that the commission never has anything to do with money. That is under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. INGALLS. So I understand.

Mr. VEST. They make requisitions on him which he approves or not at his own pleasure. This language is copied from the act which created the Mississippi River Commission and the Missouri River Commission. The House struck out both the Mississippi River Commission and the Missouri River Commission, and put the work on both back under the control of the Secretary of War.

Under this bill as it is before the Senate the Missouri River below Sioux City is put back under the control of the Missouri River Commission. The river above Sioux City is put under the control of the Bureau of Engineers. I thought myself, without saying what occurred in committee, that the whole of the river ought to be put back under the control of the Missouri River Commission, which has been in existence only one year, and that in fair dealing and justice to that commission they should have at least another year.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri a question. In lines 1255, 1256, and 1257 I find:

Improving Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton: Continuing improvement, $80,000 under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Has that portion of the river heretofore been under the control of the Missouri River Commission?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Theoretically but not practically.

Mr. INGALLS. Then why is the change made?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Engineer Corps have had practical charge of that portion of the river, and it was at the earnest request of citizens residing on the upper portion of the river that this provision was inserted.

Mr. INGALLS. I remember some time last summer being on the upper waters of the Missouri, and there I met, I think, the civilian members of this commission; they had been engaged in their surveys and operations in Montana Territory, and I heard no complaint from any quarter; and unless there is some reason other than that which now appears, it seems to me it would be a very extraordinary thing to divide the river in twain, and leave one portion of it under the control of the Secretary of War and the other under the control of the commissioners, because the river needs harmonious treatment. The system ought to be unified, and the theories upon which these two bodies may work might be entirely different, might be in conflict with each other; and unless the Senator from Minnesota is strenuous about it and shows some reasons other than those that appear to us, I should like to have those words "under the direction of the Secretary of War" omitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 1256, to insert "under the direction of the Secretary of War;" so as to read:

Improving Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton: Continuing improvement, $80,000, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I will compromise with my friend from Missouri by moving $450,000 instead of $500,000 in the paragraph just acted on.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Missouri compromises he will find somebody else who will not compromise.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Missouri will not.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I propose to add $50,000 to the paragraph beginning line 1255, and I think I can answer the Senator from Kansas when he asks why it is that the people of the Upper Missouri desire this money to be expended under the engineer officers of the Army. The Senator from Minnesota suggested that one reason was because the people up there were desirous to have this change.

I think a perusal of this report would show that some reason why the people residing on the eleven hundred and odd miles of this river from Sioux City up would be disposed to rely upon the Secretary of War and the engineer officers of the Army rather than on this commission may be found in the fact that they recommend a million dollars between Sioux City and the mouth, and $160,000 from Sioux City to Fort Benton, where nearly all the navigation on the Missouri River is, and especially so when they find it accompanied by a suggestion from Major Suter that the amount of $1,000,000 should be expended first between Kansas City and the mouth of the river.

The people on the Upper Missouri River can see no real connection, direct connection, between the permanent system of improvements suggested between Kansas City and the mouth of the Missouri, or between Sioux City and the mouth, if you please, and the improvements to be made on the Upper Missouri. The character of the country is very different. So they have believed and they now believe that a larger sum or a larger portion of the sum appropriated to the Missouri River should be expended between Sioux City and Fort Benton, where the navigation is. This general improvement, as I understand, between Sioux City and the mouth of the river involves an expenditure of seven or eight million dollars. It involves the idea of a permanent improvement of that entire line.

Mr. TELLER. Between what points?

Mr. ALLISON. Between Sioux City and the mouth of the river. This debate discloses the fact that a large portion of the sum of $500,000 mentioned in this bill is to be used in the protection and repair of works already completed on the line between Sioux City or between Council Bluffs and Omaha and the mouth of the river. Now what I mean to say is that the remainder of this $500,000 will not be expended economically between Kansas City and the mouth of the river. It is not a sufficient appropriation for the purpose of entering upon the improvement on the plan suggested by the Missouri River Commission.

Therefore I suggest that, inasmuch as in the economies of this bill we do not see our way clear to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to enter upon the system of improvement suggested by the Missouri River Commission, we divert a portion of this fund, which is confessedly here to be used for the repairs of existing works, and use it upon the Upper Missouri River, where the navigation largely is, and where it will be of immense benefit in improving that navigation.

Of the whole of the $500,000 appropriated by the last appropriation bill I find that nearly the whole of it was expended at two points on the Missouri River, Saint Joseph and Kansas City. I think there is a reasonable ground for my suggestion, arising from the suggestions of the Missouri River Commission with reference to the methods of improving the river.

I agree with the Senator from Missouri, and I should go hand and hand with him in appropriating a sufficient sum of money to make this permanent improvement; but manifestly this $500,000 will not do it, because each Senator rises here—first, the Senator from Kansas suggests two places where this money shall be expended above Kansas City; the other Senator from Kansas makes another suggestion; the Senator from Nebraska inserts two or three places in Nebraska. That discloses manifestly that of this $500,000 at least more than one-half of it may be expended in protecting or preserving and caring for and repairing works already supposed to have been completed at these points. So I say that this sum of $500,000, or the residue of it, can not be economically expended in making a permanent improvement between Kansas City and the mouth. So it will do no harm to the general plan of this bill to divert at least $50,000 to the Upper Missouri, and it will be of immense value to that portion of the stream.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment is not now in order. The question is on the amendment of the committee in line 1257.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it understood that the committee amendments shall first be considered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not aware of that. I will call the attention of the Senate to the matter later.

Mr. VEST. I would like to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he move to double the appropriation upon both ends of the river. If he will do that, I will join with him with great pleasure. I will make it $1,000,000 for the lower river and $320,000 for the upper river. That I believe is $160,000 now.

Mr. PLUMB. No; it is $80,000 now.

Mr. VEST. Then I will make it $160,000.

The House of Representatives obviously cut these appropriations down through the entire list just one-half the estimates of the Missouri River Commission. I have not the slightest objection to doubling them on the whole river; but I do specifically and strenuously object to my friend from Iowa taking $50,000 off the appropriation for the lower river and adding it to the upper. The improvements to the upper river are valueless for all great commercial purposes unless the river be improved its whole length. It can only be for local traffic that an appropriation is needed on the upper river.

Mr. ALLISON. It can hardly be called local traffic when it reaches from Fort Benton, a distance of 1,100 miles.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Iowa, I know, will agree with me, for we have both been on that part of the river, that there is nothing like the same amount of money needed between Sioux City and Fort Benton as from Kansas City to the mouth of the river. The Senator will agree to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I admit it.

Mr. VEST. That is the reason of the difference in these appropriations. That part of the river was made under the charge specifically of an engineer.

The Senator from Kansas asked me who composed this commission. Maj. Charles R. Suter is the president and United States engineer; then Maj. Alexander Mackenzie, Corps of Engineers; Maj. O. H. Ernst, Corps of Engineers, making three United States engineers, and then two civilians under the requirements of the law which organized the commission, G. C. Broadhead and William J. Broatch.

Below Sioux City Maj. Charles R. Suter has charge of the improvement; above Sioux City Capt. James B. Quinn, United States engineer, acting under the Missouri River Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee, in line 1257 inserting "under direction of the Secretary of War." The clause will be read as it will read if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Improving Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton: Continuing improvement, $80,000, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after the word "improvement," at the end of line 1260, to insert "including Davis Island dam;" so as to read:

Improving the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, including Davis Island dam, $500,000, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that practically the amendments on the next five pages are one amendment, not touching amounts but methods; and unless there is objection the Chair will treat it as one amendment, striking out and inserting. ["Agreed."]

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, to strike out from line 1327 to line 1399, inclusive, as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River, including the river at the mouth of Quincy Bay and the removal of the bar at the mouth of Whipple Creek; including also the strengthening of Sny Island levee where it crosses Snicarte Slough and other sloughs referred to in the report of Engineer Maj. A. Mackenzie, dated the 26th of January, 1885, which work of strengthening said levee shall be performed according to the suggestions and estimates of said Mackenzie as set forth in said report: Continuing improvement, $200,000: Provided, That not more than $16,500 shall be expended at Sny Island levee: Provided, It is, in the judgment of the engineers, in the interest of navigation and in accordance with the plans of the engineers.

Improving Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois River to the mouth of the Ohio River, including the completion of the work at Alton, and, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, the protection of the Illinois shore opposite the mouth of the Missouri River: Continuing improvement, $500,000; of which $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in extending the work for the protection of the eastwardly bank of the Mississippi River at Cairo, and the prevention of its wash or erosion, commencing at the southerly end of the present Government revetment work and continuing down-stream.

Improving Mississippi River from head of the passes to the mouth of the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $2,250,000; which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, without the intervention of the Mississippi River Commission: Provided, That the money appropriated by this act for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the head of the passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, except so much thereof as it shall be necessary to expend in the preventing the works in progress on other portions of the river from waste and injury, shall be expended in the continuation and completion of the works on the Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches of the river, now in progress of improvement, as established by the Mississippi River Commission, to the end that the proposed improvement of said two reaches of the river, on which the works are in progress, shall be completed at an early day, and the plan of said commission for the improvement of the navigation of the river fully tested: Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands by overflows: Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if, in their judgment, it should be done as part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel. Of the amount herein appropriated for the Lower Mississippi, $100,000 are to be expended in continuing the work in progress at New Orleans; $250,000 for the rectification of the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers by preventing further enlargement of the latter stream and restricting its outlet capacity, and for keeping open a navigable channel through the mouth of Red or Old River into the Mississippi; $50,000 in improving navigation in the Greenville reach by preventing the bank at Greenville from further caving; and $100,000 in deepening the channel at Vicksburg by dredging through the bar existing there; but this last-named sum shall not be expended, unless after another examination or survey the commission shall deem it advisable; and if they shall not, then $50,000 shall be expended in the improvement of navigation at Vicksburg by constructing suitable dikes and other appropriate works; and $75,000 in completing the work on the river at Memphis; also $25,000 for work on the river at Hickman, and $25,000 for work on the river at Columbus, Ky.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Improving Mississippi River from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River, including the river at Quincy Bay and the removal of the bar at the mouth of Whipple Creek, including also the strengthening of Sny Island levee where it crosses Snicarte Slough and other sloughs: Continuing improvement, $200,000.

Improving Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois River to the mouth of the Ohio River, including the completion of the work at Alton, and, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, the protection of the Illinois shore opposite the mouth of the Missouri River: Continuing improvement, $500,000; of which $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in extending the work for the protection of the eastwardly bank of the Mississippi River at Cairo, and the prevention of its wash or erosion, commencing at the southerly end of the present Government revetment work and continuing down-stream; and $30,000 for continuing improvement at Cape Girardeau, Mo., and Montana Point, Ill.; and the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, use so much of said sum of $500,000 as may be necessary to correct the current of the river and improve the channel at Saint Louis.

Improving Mississippi River from head of the passes to the mouth of the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $2,250,000; which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission: Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands or private property by overflows: Provided, however, That the Commission is authorized to repair and build levees if, in their judgment, it should be done as part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel. Of the amount herein appropriated for the Lower Mississippi, $100,000 are to be expended in continuing the work in progress at New Orleans; $250,000 for the rectification of the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers by preventing further enlargement of the latter stream and restricting its outlet capacity, and for keeping open a navigable channel through the mouth of Red or Old River into the Mississippi; $50,000 in improving navigation in the Greenville reach by preventing the bank at Greenville from further caving; and $100,000 in deepening the channel at Vicksburg by dredging through the bar existing there; but this last-named sum shall not be expended unless after another examination or survey the commission shall deem it advisable; and if they shall not, then $50,000 shall be expended in the improvement of navigation at Vicksburg by constructing suitable dikes and other appropriate works, and $75,000 in completing the work on the river at Memphis; also $25,000 for work on the river at Hickman, and $25,000 for work on the river at Columbus, Ky.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after the word "channel," in line 1438, the following:

And provided further, That the expenditure of so much of said appropriation as may be required to continue the improvement of Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches shall be confined to the complete repair and maintenance of the levees throughout said reaches to the height of 2 feet above the flood of 1882, and to the completion of the permeable works of contraction to such extent as may be required to bring the high-water banks of the river to the comparative uniformity of width contemplated in the first five paragraphs of the plan of improvement recommended by the Mississippi River Commission and adopted by Congress in 1880, and more fully set forth in the report of the Secretary of War for 1881, volume 2, part 3, page 2733: And provided further, That no works of bank protection or revetment shall be executed in said reaches or elsewhere until after it shall be found that the completion of the permeable contracting works and uniform width of the high-water channel will not secure the desired stability of the river-banks: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the construction of revetment works where the banks are caving, at Greenville reach, Delta Point, in front of the cities of Vicksburg, Memphis, Hickman, and Columbus: And provided further, That contraction works shall be built at the same time in the wide portions of the river immediately above the said revetment works.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senator from Kansas will explain the effect of that amendment. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. INGALLS. The difference between the proposition contained in the bill as it came from the House between lines 1327 and 1399 and the amendment proposed by the committee between lines 1400 and 1461 is, as the Chair has correctly stated, I believe, one of method; and a radical difference of opinion exists as to the method that is to be employed in the expenditure of the money which is appropriated by the bill.

If I understand the bill as it came from the House it definitely disposes of or abolishes the Mississippi River Commission. Beginning at line 1354 it reads:

Improving Mississippi River from head of the passes to the mouth of the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $2,250,000; which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, without the intervention of the Mississippi River Commission.

The corresponding part of the bill as reported from the Committee on Commerce, beginning at line 1425, reads as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from head of the passes to the mouth of the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $2,250,000;

The amount being the same—which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission.

In the one case the Mississippi River Commission is abolished and in the other it is continued.

The Mississippi River Commission have from time to time changed their views as to the method of expenditure, and during the last two years a very large amount of the money appropriated has been expended in the construction of revetment works for the purpose of protecting the shore.

The amendment that I offer is to require the money appropriated by the bill to be expended not in the construction of works for the protection of the shore, but in what are known as permeable contraction works, which were in the first place adopted by the Mississippi River Commission and which I believe to be essential for the ultimate control of the river.

The difference then between the House and the Senate is radical, the one adopting and the other abolishing the commission. The amendment offered by the Senate Committee on Commerce simply leaves the Mississippi River Commission to expend this money without instructions, and my amendment is intended to limit the expenditure of the money under the control of the Mississippi River Commission in accordance with the plan of permeable contraction works instead of revetments along the shore of the stream.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it seems to me that there ought to be some change in the method now pursued in regard to the improvement of the Mississippi River. I am not going to say what that is, but the constant changes of plan on the part of the Mississippi River Commission certainly beget in the minds of observing people the idea that the commission do not feel very sure of their ground; and the vibrating and vacillating policy which they have pursued will result in no good to the river or to the commerce which is to be floated over it.

As one evidence of what has so far resulted from the work of the commission, I will read from a dispatch which is contained in an Associated Press report of the 14th of April last, as published in the Leavenworth Daily Times and other newspapers of that date. This is a quotation from a letter written at the town of Osceola, in Arkansas, the substance of which was derived from memorials to the country at large. It is as follows:

The Mississippi River is attracting a great deal of attention at the present writing. She is bank full and running out at all places. The water now stands about 2½ feet below the great flood height of 1882, and still rising. The lower end of our city is already inundated, and it is now a matter of only a very short time before we will be compelled to take to our dug-outs and rubber boots.

We do not usually mind a small overflow, but this one is so late in the season that unless it subsides faster than it came some of our lowland farmers will not be able to put in a cotton crop this year, but will be compelled to put in all corn. We do not know whether this will be a disadvantage or not, as cotton is now so low that it hardly pays to raise it. The high water has, however, benefited us in one respect at least, as the dike between the main shore and the head of Osceola bar that the Government put in at the expenditure of a great deal of money gave way on last Monday night and now our chute is open from the head, and we only hope through the great pressure now brought to bear that the lower dike will go, and thus give us communication with the world once more, and Osceola again become a river port. The immense quantity of drift that was lodged above the dike has been running in detached sections for two days, and hundreds of acres of it have passed on down. In some instances whole sections of from 10 to 20 acres have gone down in a body. All of this immense weight lodges on the great accumulation already gathered at the lower dike, and hopes are entertained that this will break that dike and boats will once again have free access to us.

Later.—The steamer Dean Adams came into Osceola on the morning of April 9, and went out at the head of the chute through the break in the upper dike.

In other words, as the Government works give way there follows great rejoicing on the part of the people on the banks of the Mississippi River, moved to it by the reason that these works have cut off their accustomed means of communication by the waters of that stream. The satisfaction that appears from this dispatch is caused by the fact that the Government works have given way. I suppose probably there might have been some little corresponding satisfaction at the time the money was being expended, making a market undoubtedly for corn and other produce; but when the money was once spent the Osceola people began to realize that although by reason of the expenditure they had had some little profit while it went along, it had cut them off from any relation to the channel of the Mississippi River, on the banks of which this town is located. Of course there went up one general prayer for deliverance; and as high water came down, notwithstanding it made them take to their rubber boots and destroyed the chance there for a cotton crop, yet when it restored the channel of the Mississippi River the rejoicing was intensified.

Thus it goes. There is a general demand for the appropriation of money to improve the river and great satisfaction while the money is being expended; but the result, always to be followed with great rejoicing, is that the annual floods come down and carry the work away. A blind man, a boy fourteen years of age, would know that if we want to have a judicious expenditure of public money that is not the way to improve the Mississippi River.

I have been told by persons who know that river by reason of having traveled it not only recently but at frequent intervals through the past five or six years, that practically no good result has followed the appropriation of public money for its improvement heretofore.

I have no doubt that largely grows out of the fact that the plans are constantly changed, and of course I can realize the effect of the operations of an engineer of the Army who proceeds to improve the Mississippi River by cutting off a prosperous village from it by interposing a great bank of sand and dikes in such a way that the commerce and the trade of that town and the immediate section of country are destroyed. That is nothing to him. That is a consequence which cuts no figure with him. His salary goes on, and in fact I think his standing in the corps of which he is a valued member is increased somewhat by the fact that he has constructed a work which would have irretrievably damaged the locality if it had been kept on and had staid, and the people who live upon the banks of the river were constantly importuning us to end it; as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says, the vulgar crowd who live along that river. Vulgar, of course, by comparison with those engineers.

We have supposed that one of the difficulties in regard to this river was that at certain seasons of the year there is too much water; but according to the idea of the Mississippi River Commission that is not the case—there is not enough water; and therefore they have developed a plan, as found stated on page 2554 and following of their report made to this present Congress, for securing the entry into the channel of that river of more water, in order that the people of Osceola probably shall be cut off from the satisfaction of being able to wade out from an ordinary flood in the river and they will be obliged to swim out or drown.

So, as I said, when the Mississippi River Commission came to a consideration of that question they propose to put a big dam into the Atchafalaya River so as to see that no water shall go down that river, but that all the water shall go down the Mississippi River, and that the portion of it which now goes into the Atchafalaya Bayou shall be inevitably and always carried into the Mississippi River, thereby, of course, increasing, according to what we would suppose to be the obvious effect, the volume of water to be taken care of below, and increasing the necessity for levees and the danger of overflows, and of that destruction which comes from a surplus of water. So a dam is to be built in the Atchafalaya Bayou and the water shut off from going down to the Gulf of Mexico by that means of communication.

Of course it is easy enough to read between the lines and to see that this is in total disregard of the public aspect of the case, and that it is done for the purpose of making sure that the river shall never be improved, and there shall always be work for engineers upon it. It would seem to an ordinary layman that if you could eliminate the water at that time when it comes down in great volume and inevitably overflows the adjacent land the improvement of that river would be much simplified. But it is not simplification that the Engineer Corps seeks. That highly ornamental branch of the military service known as the Engineer Corps in devising and making plans for the improvement of the Mississippi River give the most attention to the construction of a dam whereby more water must be carried into the river than would ordinarily flow into it.

Some millions of dollars have been spent in the so-called improvement of that river, and I will venture to say that with the exception of the amount of money that was spent at the mouth of the river under the direction of Captain Eads practically none of it has yielded any useful result at all in controlling or deepening the channel of the river. I do not speak of this as one believing that it is possible at all times to control the volume of that river. I believe that our work upon it should largely be in the direction of modifying and qualifying the effects that follow the great floods which come down annually, not with the expectation of always controlling them, of being able always to bring them within certain limits, but of so managing as that the danger may be reduced to the minimum, and that we may meanwhile gain knowledge by experience which may be usefully applied. Instead of that, you have the judgment of a corps of men who practice upon it as medical students would practice upon a dead body, totally regardless of the live, active interests which are involved, and which they proceed, as in the case of Osceola, to destroy at will.

I do not know about the special merit of the amendment of my colleague; but as something is better than nothing and we absolutely know that nothing has heretofore resulted from the expenditure of money under the Mississippi River Commission, it seems that it is time to make some change. A more useful change in my judgment would be to let the whole matter go until we could be certain of getting this whole work in the hands of some one who should bring to it the necessary genius and skill and responsibility, so that at least we might have the reasonably decent hope of a useful result to follow the expenditure of the money.

So far we have been between two fires, between two theories, moved in the first place by the planters and others of Louisiana and the Lower Mississippi to put levees along the banks of the Mississippi River to prevent a possible overflow, and with no thought, practically speaking, of the limitation of the quantity of water to float down the stream, but with only the remedy of constantly building the levees higher as the floods themselves increase. Of course these levees give way. Then there is great disaster, and then there are great appropriations to follow for the purpose of repairing the disaster to the individuals who suffer; and of course there is an inevitable erosion against which no levee can ever be made proof. There is no possible combination of earth or of earth and brush on the banks of the stream that can be relied upon to always keep the water out from the lands that lie back.

As I said when a similar bill was under consideration the last time, the only way to make sure of an improvement of this character is to build a railroad along the bank, in order that there may be at hand at all times the means for the instantaneous transportation of materials to fill up the breaks that will inevitably be made by the current of this great river.

On the other hand, discarding the levee system, we have had the theories recently advanced upon the authority of Captain Eads of contracting the channel practically at the longer reaches and thereby enabling the water to scour out the channel and make it deeper at all times between the banks, instead of, as now, a constant deposit of silt by reason of the slackening current, which makes the river bed rise annually. I believe it goes without question that the river lies on a ridge, and that that ridge under the present condition of things increases in height every year, and that there is not only an actual increase but a relative increase in height, so that not only does the bed of the river rise each year by reason of this deposit but it rises relatively to the banks, and consequently makes an overflow more certain each year unless this is restrained by means of levees or some other artificial obstruction. That of course can not go on always. There must be a time when we shall come to the end of that, because in time if we do not the river will then rise out of its present level.

So far as the reclamation involved in the building of levees is concerned, I beg the Senate to observe that when this question first came to be considered by Congress seriously about 1835 it was the judgment of the men who at that time controlled legislation that that was an operation for the individuals and the States affected thereby, and for the purpose of such a reclamation grants of swamp lands were made. There has been a good deal of talk from time to time about the grants made in aid of railroads, but for simple Simon Pure extravagance, for a donation of the public domain without any return whatever, direct or indirect, nothing has ever equaled the extravagance of the gifts of swamp lands to States. It was done under misapprehension, under misrepresentation, upon the theory, in the first place, that only a small area of land was of the swamp character described in the statute. The first report upon this subject deals in great detail and at great length with the subject of swamp lands of the States of Arkansas and Missouri, and the estimate is that there are less than 2,000,000 acres in both those States, yet, if my recollection does not fail me, those two States got in the neighborhood of 10,000,000 acres of land supposed to be swamp land.

Not only that, but the grant went on further to say that these States were prepared with money and other adequate facilities for the reclamation of this land; and yet we all know that practically no money has been expended for any such purpose. The State of Florida, for instance, had 18,000,000 acres of swamp land certified to it, and it has not reclaimed an acre, but has given every single one of it to railroad companies.

So all that we spend now in the way of erecting levees along the banks of the Mississippi is simply adding to that which was given to the States nearly forty years ago in order that they might do this work themselves. I only speak of this in passing to show how we have been beating backward and forward between these two theories, on the one side the self-interest of the people, who have had ample funds to do these things for themselves, and on the other side the theory of engineers of note as to the only way by which this great river could be kept under any reasonable control.

Now we come to the Mississippi River Commission, changing its theories from year to year and agreeing upon nothing except to spend all the money that we give, and, like the horse-leech's daughter, crying annually for more; and then we do not know how many places there may be on the banks of this great stream situated like Osceola in Arkansas, in which the only day which is given over to unrestrained thanksgiving and rejoicing is the day when the Government works go down, whereby they can get back again on the bank of the great stream and enjoy communication with the outer world.

As I said, it seems to be quite time something was done to change this order of things. We might as well throw the money first as last into the current of the river and let the Government profit by its disappearance utterly from circulation, not liable thereby to redeem it, as to spend it in the way the money has been spent in the past few years.

Probably the most competent person who was ever upon that commission was Captain Eads. I do not believe in him as the man who possesses all the necessary qualities for this or any other great work. At the same time he has that stimulus which now is now entirely lacking, that of a great reputation honorably and worthily achieved, which is in the balance in whatever he does, and the further stimulus that new honor is to be won, backed by a great brain and by a determination equal to all the emergencies which can be presented.

If the Government could take the harbors of this country like Galveston and the Mississippi River and make a contract with some man of that kind, at almost any price which could be named, paying him only as results were achieved, as was the case with the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi River, we could sit down with the anticipation of something to be derived from the expenditure of money, even although we might pay a great and what seemed to be at the time an extravagant price. But as it is now, it is $100,000, and $500,000, and $1,000,000 thrown in, and like the man who always subscribes if anybody asks him but for a dollar, we give what is asked, glad that it is not more, shutting our eyes to the fact that out of it all comes no useful result.

I think it is time that this work shall stop, unless we can put it upon some better basis. Why should we go on improving Galveston Harbor and the Mississippi River only to be confronted each year with the utter failure of all that has been done, and realize our utter helplessness, with the means at command, with our plan of operations, to ever do anything any better?

M. GIBSON addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the question being on the amendment of Mr. INGALLS to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce relative to the improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the subject of the improvement of the Mississippi River is one of exceeding interest, whether it is looked at from the standpoint of commerce or of science. Congress in 1880 constituted a commission composed in part of officers of the Engineer Corps of the United States, and having one member from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, one member, who is a civil engineer, from civil life, and in its original constitution one layman. This commission has since been in charge of the work of improvement on the Mississippi River. In reading its reports I find that the commission claims to have advanced a good deal in its understanding of some of the laws regulating this river.

In the original act there was a suggestion, evidently intended to promote the building of levees upon the lower river as a part of the plan of improvement.

Under the words "give ease and safety to navigation," they were to consider the question whether levees would promote that end. At the beginning the commission in considering this question did not adopt the levee system as a part of their plan of improvement. They spoke of it as a desirable but not as a necessary adjunct of the plan. I read a brief extract from that report:

> While it is not claimed that levees in themselves are necessary as a means of securing ultimately a deep channel for navigation, it is believed that the repair and maintenance of the extension levees already existing will hasten the work of channel improvement through the increased scour and depth of river bed which they would produce during the higher stages. They are regarded as a desirable, though not a necessary adjunct in the general system of improvement submitted.

The view of the commission at that time was that the engineer works would accomplish the rectification of the defects in the low-water navigation of the Mississippi. Those engineer works were intended to contract the water way, to reduce the abnormal width of the river at certain points where bars exist, and by reducing the width of the stream and concentrating the low-water flow to give increased depth at those points.

The first reports of the commission defended this as a practicable and sufficient method of improvement. Levees were spoken of as a desirable and not a necessary adjunct. Having been a member of the commission myself for two years after its formation, I know that the sentiment of the commission was as expressed in this extract which I have read. It was believed that the engineer works would correct defects in navigation by themselves and without the aid of a levee system. I agree that in these years members who have continued upon the commission should have learned something, and they tell us they have learned a good deal, and especially with reference to the efficiency and necessity of levees in connection with their plan of improvement. I find in the last report of the commission that a general system of levees, beginning at the mouth of the river and extending upward, is a part of their plan. Upon this subject the following conclusions are reached:

> Therefore, it is the opinion of the commission that the building of levees for the improvement of navigation in the obstructed portion of the river can not proceed indefinitely without involving damages to the proprietary interests below; and if this portion of the improvement to navigation is to proceed, provision must be made for strengthening and raising the levees in the lower portion of the river where navigation is now good.

In other words, they have stopped the work they were doing in the upper portion of the river, where they were putting in these engineer works, which if continued would produce results upon the lower river that would be destructive by increasing the flood height. They, therefore, express the opinion that if the levees are to be constructed upon the upper river it will be necessary to counteract their first effects at least by beginning a system of levees at the mouth of the river and extending it upward. The report continues:

> This recommendation is not based on conditions which will be continually increasing or even permanent. No reason is apparent why the law that a larger volume of water flows through a bed adjustable by its own forces to its own needs, with less resistance and slope, should not ultimately be fully operative here.
> During the transition period unquestionably the increase of work will be indicated by increase of slope, which will disappear as the equilibrium is re-established.
> The following general order is believed to be judicious in the completion of a levee system. As its object is generally to enlarge the water way, a common-sense analogy is found in the homely art of ditching. It should begin at the lower end. Each bottom, the Manchac, La Fourche, and Atchafalaya, constituting Lower Louisiana, the Tensas, Yazoo, White, and Saint Francis, should be inclosed in order from below upward.
> In each bottom, as it is reached in the foregoing order, the most important levees, as restraining the greatest escape of water, should be first constructed.

I read this in order that Senators may understand the position now taken by the Mississippi River Commission, the majority of it, as to levee construction, that they can not pursue their system of repairing and constructing levees on the upper river without damage to the lower river, and that being so, they suggest that the work of building levees should begin at the mouth of the river and be extended upward until a complete system of levees is provided.

If the construction of these levees is essential to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, I am in favor of it. I will not yield to any one in my sense of the importance of keeping open this great channel of commerce. I think that almost any expenditure of money that would establish and maintain 10 feet of water from Saint Louis to New Orleans would be of incalculable benefit to the country. It is in the highest sense a national work.

I do not know, sir, of anything in this bill, not excepting the great harbor of New York, that is more strictly and widely national in its scope than the improvement of the Mississippi River. And, Mr. President, if it is necessary I do not object at all to the fact that an incidental benefit results to those who own land upon the Mississippi River. So far from objecting, where such an incident is found in connection with the improvement I should rejoice at it that these people are improved in their estate by an expenditure which is strictly national and directed to a purpose which is within the scope of our constitutional power. But I can not, and I could not when I was upon the commission, give my assent to the proposition that the principal moving motive toward the construction of these levees was the reclamation or protection of land.

My friend from Louisiana who has just spoken [Mr. GIBSON] has referred kindly to my experience as a member of this commission. I recall an incident showing that very natural interest which he and those people whom he represents upon the lower river feel in this commission as connected with levee improvement. I recollect that the Senator from Louisiana, then a member of the House of Representatives, finding my name to the minority report, the first report of the commission, in which views were expressed, in connection with General Comstock, of the Engineer Corps, as to the relation of levees to this improvement, did me the honor, I think, to introduce a bill in the House of Representatives which provided that the Mississippi River Commission should be reduced to six members, and that the members appointed from civil life should be all civil engineers.

The bill might have been entitled properly a bill to remove me from the Mississippi River Commission. That was the sense which the Senator from Louisiana at that time had of my services in connection with that distinguished body. I may say in passing that the bill did not pass, and I left the commission by promotion and not by expulsion.

As I say, the commission have progressed from that time to this, and the majority of them now recommend the general system of levees. It involves an enormous cost. It is not proposed that the States or the abutting property-owners shall contribute at all to the work except so far as they have already contributed where the levees are found to be suitably located and can be utilized by the Mississippi River Commission.

I find that this last report is not a unanimous one. Professor Henry Mitchell, of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, whom I regard as one of the most scientific and accomplished men upon such subjects as this in the United States, submits a minority report, in the course of which he says:

> I have signed the above report with some misgivings as to the purport of the two articles entitled respectively "Levees and Outlets" and "Rectification of the Red and Atchafalaya Rivers."

He then proceeds:

> The commission has undertaken the reconstruction of levees along the fronts of the Yazoo and Tensas basins, with the expectation that these would improve navigation and determine the value of this means of improvement as compared with other means under trial. The results of these costly experiments have not yet been ascertained, and until benefits have been discovered from repeated surveys at low water there would seem to be no ground for recommending a complete application of the levee system.

I read another extract:

> Before recommending or in any degree favoring such "complete application" of the levee system, I prefer to await the results of our own experiments, and I will add that these results will much exceed my expectation if they justify the extension of levee work 270 miles beyond the obstructed portion of the river, and the introduction of a change of regimen where no change can be for the better.

So it seems that there is some division of opinion still upon the commission as to whether the project of beginning the construction of levees at the mouth of this river should be undertaken and the work prosecuted until a complete system is obtained along the whole river front.

Mr. President, I do not know how we are to deal with this question unless we can commit it into the keeping of some board or to the keeping of somebody in whom we have confidence. I do not believe that the general system of levees spoken of is necessary to the work of correcting the defects in the low-water channel of the Mississippi. As Professor Mitchell says, it is to be extended along a front of 270 miles where the river does not need any improvement now, where navigation is perfect, where all the year round there is an adequate depth of water for all the commerce that can float upon it; and it is to be extended there in order to protect that stretch of the river from the ill effects of constructing levees above.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are those ill effects?

Mr. HARRISON. Those ill effects are that it increases the flood below, concentrates the water, and gives increased flow and velocity, and as it is expressed here by the commission:

> The building of levees for the improvement of navigation in the obstructed portion of the river can not proceed indefinitely without involving damages to the proprietary interests below.

That is, raising the flood line so as to require an elevation of the levee. I do not believe that is necessary; and yet, of course, upon a question of this kind I confess my own insufficiency. I only know that every member of this commission at one time gave his adhesion to the proposition that the interchannel works which were indispensable would be sufficient in themselves to rectify the defects in the low-water navigation.

I believed then, I fear now, that if this great levee system over 270 miles of unimpaired river is to be attached to the Mississippi River improvement, it will break down under the weight. I believed then that the proper course was to separate it as far as possible from this work and to adopt it only when it became apparent that it was necessary; and if it has the effects which they contend for it, and which the Senator from Louisiana has ascribed to it, then let us adopt the levee system as a plan of improvement and abandon the interchannel work. Both can not be justified, it seems to me, unless the inefficiency of each is first established.

This amendment of the Senator from Kansas—and the Senator from Louisiana favors it—proposes to impose upon the Mississippi River Commission that is given charge of this work by the Senate committee's amendment the ideas, the plans of Captain Eads—which are illogical—plans that the Mississippi River Commission disapprove. Let us have this matter carried through to its logical end. If in the opinion of the Senate Captain Eads's views and plans in reference to the improvement of this river are right, then abolish the commission and put Captain Eads in charge. If we believe that there is greater wisdom in the recommendations of the commission, then let us stand by them. I take it the Senator from Louisiana believes, as I understand Captain Eads also believes, in the levee system, and we shall have a levee system in connection with this new idea of his, which is that the revetment of caving banks should be abandoned.

Mr. President, there is just one problem involved in connection with the improvement of the Mississippi, and but one. It is the question of preventing the banks from tumbling into the river. It is perfectly easy. It has been demonstrated that the bars in the river can be removed and good navigation established simply by contracting the width of the river at these points, and this can be done at a reasonable cost when we consider the benefits to result. I have no sort of question that over these reaches, where in low water we have sometimes 5 and 5½ feet only, upon every one of them there can be established a depth of from 10 to 15 feet of water simply by the contraction of the water way by the interchannel work. But when you have done that, when you have corrected the places where these evils exist now, it will not do to turn the river over to its own sweet will, in my judgment.

Why are these bars there now? Why is it that you are required to contract the water way? Why is it abnormally wide? Simply because the banks have tumbled in. That is what is the matter with it; and every other point on the river and in these concave bends there are caving banks, and the width of the stream is constantly being augmented and a new bar will develop in every such place. It is inevitable. Then you go on and correct and narrow the stream where it is now too wide. There is another place, as I recollect, besides Vicksburg where this is so; and I only say to my distinguished friend from Illinois that if the river had been when he was besieging Vicksburg where it was when I was on it he could have got his gunboats over there without any trouble. That whole point of bank was being torn away, and this very amendment recognizes the propriety of moving the banks at Vicksburg and other points where they are washing away, to revet them to save a town, revet them to save a harbor. But this amendment of the Senator from Kansas declares they shall not be revetted at any other point.

It seems to me altogether illogical. I believe Captain Eads has some idea that when these wide places are contracted the water of the Mississippi will be restored to a sort of natural condition, will get its own proper swing, and the banks will not cave anywhere. I do not believe in the theory.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator if that is not absolutely the case below New Orleans and for a considerable distance above New Orleans.

Mr. HARRISON. There are no banks below New Orleans to cave, practically none.

Mr. EUSTIS. I beg to correct the Senator; he is entirely mistaken on that point.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana what the highest bank below New Orleans is above the ordinary level of the water?

Mr. EUSTIS. One of the highest levees in the State of Louisiana is below New Orleans.

Mr. HARRISON. That is very possible; but that does not show that the natural bank is high by any manner of means. On the other hand it would tend to show that it was low.

Mr. EUSTIS. If the statement of the Senator be true, the caving would occur below New Orleans as effectively as it would above New Orleans.

Mr. HARRISON. These banks are not found below New Orleans according to my observation on a single trip. As you approach the Gulf the land is extremely low and not much above the level of the river itself.

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. EUSTIS. When the Mississippi River falls and gets to a very low point, then the caving begins. Sometimes it is a levee and sometimes it is a bank. The recession of the water from the earth is apt to make the bank cave unless it is protected.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator why the banks do not cave below New Orleans, if he says they do not?

Mr. EUSTIS. That is owing to the peculiar currents of the river and the eddies of the river.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know why they should be peculiar there except that the river is approaching its level in the Gulf. Perhaps its velocity is lost; certainly it is lost somewhere below New Orleans.

Mr. EUSTIS. The velocity of the river?

Mr. HARRISON. As it aproaches the Gulf.

Mr. EUSTIS. Not much.

Mr. HARRISON. I supposed that would be the effect of it, but I am not an expert and have seen it but once, while the Senator has seen it always; but I suppose as it approaches the Gulf its velocity would be somewhat retarded. Certainly the high caving banks that we see elsewhere up about Greenville are not there. At Greenville the bank stands I do not know how high, but an enormously high bank, and it is now caving so much that even this amendment recognizes the necessity of revetting the bank to save the town.

It seems to me that that work will go on, that the river will here and there so tear away the banks; and if it is allowed to go on tearing away the banks then you will have an abnormally wide river at that place, and just as soon as you get an abnormally wide river you will have an abnormally low river, because you will have bars formed there.

The one problem is the question of holding the banks. If it can be done by any artificial work, or if the effect of their work, interchannel work, levees, or what not, is to prevent the caving of the banks, then I undertake to say the problem of improving the Mississippi River is solved. I believe the one troublesome unsolved question is how that is to be done.

But I am myself at a loss to know what we ought to do. I want to see this great work of improvement go on. I would like to see the money to be appropriated expended solely upon these reaches where untried experiments are. I do not like to see it so voted in this bill as that a majority of the commission may enter upon the work of constructing 270 miles of levee, when one of the most skillful men of the commission says that the experiment is yet untried as to what the effect of it will be, and when he protests against it.

It seems to me that we should go on and complete these experiments upon Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches, and that we should not impose upon the Mississippi River Commission the supervision of Captain Eads, and that is what the amendment of the Senator from Kansas proposes to do. If we have so much faith in him that we adopt his views with reference to this, then let us be logical about it and put him in charge. If we are going to trust the Mississippi River Commission let us trust them. At the same time I think we should put such limitations on this appropriation as that the commission will not, without the consent of Congress directly given, enter upon the work of constructing levees on 270 miles of that river as an auxiliary or adjunct to their improvements above. That ought to be demonstrated better than it is now before it is undertaken. It ought to have the distinct sanction of Congress before it is undertaken. Whatever they may think necessary, as they have thought it necessary to construct levees in connection with the work they were improving to such an extent as not to put in peril the property-holders on the lower river, let them go on and do it, but it ought not to be undertaken to levee this river from its mouth to its source without a distinct approval of Congress to that plan.

As I said, Mr. President, as a friend of this improvement I scarcely know how we are to get out of this difficulty. I am clear that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas ought not to be adopted, because it is imposing views here against the wishes and the recommendations of the commission that is to be in charge of the work.

I believe, also, that there ought to be something in this appropriation that will restrain the commission from entering upon this work of constructing levees along the lower river where navigation is now good and is not to be helped by levees.

Their construction there is simply to counteract the effects of something that is done above. That is all they propose it for. It is not that the river needs scouring down there. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] has eloquently described the effects of this scouring. It does not need any scouring there; it is deep enough now; and the leveeing there is simply to counteract the effects of the levees above.

Does it not raise a question even if they are right in supposing that levees on the upper river where they are constructing them are an important adjunct to the improvement of these bad reaches in the river—does it not raise a serious question whether the value of those levees at those points is so great that the Government should undertake the construction of 270 miles of levee on the lower river where no improvement is needed in navigation in order to get the benefit they could get, if any, from the levees on the points of the river that are being improved?

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question again?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask him whether the commission did not report that the levee system was a desirable adjunct to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EUSTIS. Was not that report made when the Senator was a member of it?

Mr. HARRISON. It was, but I signed the minority report. The Senator has not got me there.

Mr. EUSTIS. He disagreed with the majority?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir, I signed the report with General Comstock, and if the Senator would like to hear it I could give it to him. I have it here on my desk.

Mr. EUSTIS. No, I do not care to hear it.

Mr. HARRISON. I will read from the minority report:

But even if a rise or fall of a foot or two in the bed of the river were produced by levees, it is difficult to see how this would sensibly affect the low-water width of the river. Bad navigation arises from excessive low-water width at certain places, and is to be cured by contracting that low-water width to about 3,000 feet. This contraction must be effected by works in the bed of the river, and not by levees on top of its banks, out of contact with the low-water river.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that levees are of very little value in improving the low-water navigation of the river. Of their necessity in protecting alluvial lands against destructive floods there can be no doubt, and to obtain such protection the first step would be the closure of gaps in existing levees. The regulation of the low-water river, including the fixation of the river banks, would be of the greatest aid to the levees, since it would secure them from destruction by caving.

That minority report was prepared by General C. B. Comstock, still a member of the commission, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a moment. I desired to propound a question to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] while he was on the floor in regard to the matter of the depth of water; and I make the suggestion now the more readily because I had occasion to see a correction of a statement once made on that point. I heard it once stated that this channel was about 24 feet in depth. I thought he made a mistake of 1 foot if not more. The Senator said the channel was 30 feet deep at the mouth of the Mississippi now. I desired to call his attention to that point.

There seem to be different opinions as to what is meant by the depth of channel. I supposed it meant necessarily a navigable channel, and when the Senator said 30 feet in depth I presumed that he meant it was for vessels drawing 30 feet of water. Did I understand correctly?

Mr. GIBSON. I meant the channel.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator meant a navigable channel. Then I say that the report of the engineer of the Army shows that the Senator is wrong, that there is not a navigable channel of 30 feet, and the engineer himself discriminates between a legal channel and a navigable channel, and that certainly is a strange discrimination. That was the inquiry I desired to propound to the Senator from Louisiana, whether, when he said a 30-foot channel he meant what is understood all over the world as a 30-foot channel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What the engineer means, as I understand him, by legal channel as distinguished from a navigable one is a channel that will draw money from the Treasury but will not carry a ship. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly. That was the point I desired to have the Senator from Louisiana make plain, whether he meant a channel drawing from the Treasury or drawing a vessel. The Senator says he means one carrying a vessel drawing 30 feet of water. That is what he says he means; but the engineer of the Army, in the report furnished by the Secretary of War, shows that here is a discrimination in the channel by technical terms, a 30-foot legal channel; and at the same time he says a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet of water will ground in that channel. What does he mean? The engineer says that a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet of water will ground in that channel. Then I should like to know what the Senator understands by a 30-foot channel through which a vessel drawing 25 feet of water can not be navigated.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask the Senator to read the report on that point.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will read it before this discussion ends. The engineer, in his diagram showing the sinuosities of this river, measures the channel at one point 30 feet right through the center of the spot in this winding way, but when you take the length of a vessel and seek to get it through that channel the engineer says that one drawing 25 or 26 feet of water will be grounded; and he says in his report that there is a difference between the legal and the navigable channel. The Senator from Vermont has given the correct explanation.

Mr. EUSTIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. EUSTIS. Do I understand the Senator to make the statement that the engineer has not complied with the requirements of the law?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator may draw his inference. That would not necessarily follow I assume.

Mr. EUSTIS. That is a direct question.

Mr. VAN WYCK. A very direct question.

Mr. EUSTIS. Do I understand the Senator to state that Captain Eads has not complied with the requirements of the law?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will answer the question in a moment when the Senator gives me a chance to utter a sentence or two. I was trying to find out what Captain Eads was to do. Was Captain Eads to make a legal channel that the engineer speaks of, or was he to make a navigable channel? If Captain Eads was to make a navigable channel, which I think he was under the law, 30 feet deep, then Captain Eads has not done it. If Captain Eads was to make a channel which could be ingeniously measured through which a vessel only drawing 25 feet of water could pass and hardly that——

Mr. EUSTIS. I suppose the Senator will admit that Captain Eads is not called upon to make a channel to suit him. The reason why I ask the question is this: If Captain Eads has not complied with the requirements of law, and there is a monthly report made of the depth of that channel, how is it that the United States Government has made regularly payments to Captain Eads based on the reports of the engineer of the United States Army? That is the question I want the Senator to answer.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator knowing the ease and facility with which money is drawn from the United States Treasury would not, surely, propound that as a difficult conundrum.

Mr. EUSTIS. Then the Senator impeaches, as I understand—I repeat the word, "impeaches"—the conduct of the War Department in reference to paying money to Captain Eads. That is, in his opinion it has done it in violation of law. It is an unfounded assertion, Mr. President.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It would seem to be so.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to put a question to the Senator from Louisiana for my own satisfaction and that of the public? What is the judgment of the intelligent persons representing the commerce of New Orleans on the question he has just put?

Mr. EUSTIS. The judgment is that this work has been a work of eminent success, surpassing the expectations that were formed and disappointing the expectations of those who were opposed to it.

Mr. HOAR. That was my idea.

Mr. EUSTIS. And I repeat that if the Senator from Nebraska will reflect he will see that the Government of the United States, having its own officer, an expert, to supervise this work, and he making monthly reports, has through the Department of War been regularly paying Captain Eads for the simple reason that he has complied exactly and explicitly with all the requirements of the law under which the contract was made.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The fact is all the same notwithstanding. The fact is that the money has been drawn for a channel which is not such a channel as the law requires.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the Senator from Nebraska put that question to me?

Mr. LOGAN. I hope I may be allowed a moment, inasmuch as the charge would reflect perhaps upon the persons selected by the Senate to investigate this matter, to state what the facts are.

The authority of Mr. Eads to do this work was under the act of March 3, 1875.

By act of March 3, 1875, Congress authorized Mr. James B. Eads and his associates to build jetties or other works in the South Pass of the Mississippi River, the object being to get and maintain deep water over the bar at the mouth of the pass, and through the pass into the river. By the terms of the contract Mr. Eads was to obtain a channel 30 feet deep and 350 feet wide, and for this he and his associates were to receive five and one-quarter million dollars, the final $1,000,000 not to be paid until the 30-foot channel had been maintained for ten years, when they were to receive one-half million dollars, the remaining half million to be paid when the same channel had been maintained an additional ten years, or in all for twenty years' maintenance from the date at which this channel was first obtained. In addition he was to receive $100,000 per annum for maintaining this channel, as well as interest at 5 per cent. on the final million dollars.

Another provision of the contract is in effect that the Government can stop payment of cost of maintenance, together with interest on the final million dollars, at any time after the required channel was obtained, by paying this million dollars.

The work on the jetties was begun—

This is from the report made by the engineers—

in 1875, and was pushed with such vigor that in 1879 a channel 26 feet deep was secured through the jetties and through the pass. There was a channel of 30 feet contained within that of 26 feet, but it was very narrow.

By acts of June, 1878, and March 3, 1879, Congress so amended the original contract that Mr. Eads and his associates were required to obtain a depth of but 26 feet, and a width of only 200 feet at bottom, having through it a central depth of 30 feet "without regard to width."

According to the interpretation now put upon the law there must be maintained a channel 26 feet wide, and 200 feet at bottom, having a central depth of 30 feet "without regard to width," through the jetties and into the Gulf, and a channel 26 feet in depth of navigable width must be maintained through the pass from the jetties into the river proper.

The channels must be maintained twenty years from July 8, 1879, at which time these depths were first obtained.

That is the law. Mr. Eads was required to obtain a depth of 26 feet and a channel 200 feet wide, but within that 26 feet there was to be 30 feet depth, and Mr. Eads complied with that contract strictly. I passed through that pass with a committee and measured every yard of it from one end to the other, both depth and width, and I found that he had complied strictly with the contract. He was working under an act of Congress providing that he should make a channel of a certain depth and a certain width, it being changed from the first act. That is not his fault, and he is not to be accused of a wrong because the law authorized him to make the channel narrower and not so deep.

I will further state that while I was there in 1883 our committee saw the largest vessel with the largest cargo of cotton that ever passed out of the city of New Orleans go through that pass from one end to the other; and you can not find a merchant in the city of New Orleans to-day who will not tell you that that work is a complete success. I so stated in a report, and I repeat it on this floor.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator tell us what his impression was of the works on the Mississippi River?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to go into that; but I will say that if any one will send and get the report made by myself as chairman of the committee at that time, printed under an order of the Senate of January 18, 1884, he will find what that committee determined. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] was one of the committee who passed down the river and examined the work. All the members of the committee signed the report showing that the work was well performed, and not only that, but that the channel was being deepened.

I will make one further statement. South of Plum Point 25 miles where the channel had been from 3½ to 4 feet deep there was preliminary work showing that it was not necessary to commence at the mouth of the Mississippi River prior to the undertaking of this great work, and the channel was so changed that it gave 8 feet at the low stages of water, and the largest boats were plying at the lowest stages of water through that channel and are doing it to-day in consequence of the very work that has been going on under this commission.

I could go on and give statement after statement about Plum Point and these other places; but I have not time to do it. I ask any one to examine the report of that committee. We examined the depth of the channel, the revetment, the mattress operations along the sides of the river, and everything else that was being done, and also the work done in the channel for the purpose of throwing the volume of water into it and deepening it and washing it out. It is fully and completely stated in that report. Now to sit here and allow an attack to be made on a man who has performed his work according to the act of Congress, according to his contract, who has complied with it in every particular, I will not submit to, for the statement is not true and it is not fair or just to him, for he complied with his contract in every particular under the law as passed by Congress. The Secretary of War is doing no more than the law requires him to do to-day in paying the money, because it is in strict compliance with the law under which this contract was made.

Mr. EUSTIS. In what month was it that the Senator from Illinois made the examination?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember, but I can soon find out.

Mr. ALLISON. In October, I think.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps it was.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I believe there is no question here about the jetties.

Mr. LOGAN. I was only making these suggestions in reply to what was said by the Senator from Nebraska and what was said by the Senator from Vermont by an inquiry that had as much force in it as an argument in opposition to this proposition. Having examined the work, I would not sit here and allow such a statement to be made which I know is not true.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will say that I was only replying to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I was about appealing to Senators now that the replies have all been made that we confine ourselves to a discussion of this item, if it is agreeable to Senators, so that we can get along with the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have not yet finished my sentence that I was uttering when the Senator from Illinois interrupted me.

Mr. BUTLER. I was about to appeal to the Senator from Nebraska to let us adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; the Senate ought to finish the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. You will make nothing by sitting here to-night.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think the suggestion is very wise. The Senate can be further enlightened.

Mr. BUTLER (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). If the Senator from Nebraska will yield the floor I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the motion will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—16.

Blackburn,	Camden,	Eustis,	Pugh,
Brown,	Cameron,	Gorman,	Vance,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] in his remarks spoke about this channel as a channel of 30 feet; and when I found it necessary, because I was not able to propound a question on that subject during his remarks, to ask for information from him as to what he meant by 30 feet channel, he stated that he meant a channel 30 feet; that is a channel which would pass a vessel drawing 30 feet of water. That was my understanding. I had previously stated that this channel was only about 24 feet, and there probably I made a mistake of a foot, because I showed that the engineer's statement was that a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet of water will ground in that channel. Surely, therefore, it is not a 30-foot channel.

Then the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] propounded some inquiries as to the matter of compensation. I referred to the engineer's statement that it seemed to be recognized as a legal channel for one purpose and a navigable channel for another purpose. What does the engineer mean when he speaks of it as a legal channel? That was the point in issue, and the Senator says the contract is complied with. The point we were talking about was what was the actual channel? Thirty feet is claimed, and some Senators criticise my statement as wrong, because they say this is a channel of 30 feet, when it is not a channel to exceed 25 feet. If a vessel drawing 25 feet will ground, as the engineer says, then the statement of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is wrong that it is a 26-foot channel. If a vessel drawing 25 feet grounds in the channel, then it is not a 26-foot channel, and the Senator from Illinois is mistaken, or else the engineer of the Army is mistaken. A vessel drawing 25 feet grounds——

Mr. CONGER. Grounds on the side.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No matter where she grounds if she grounds. There has been very much said about this which is not warranted or sustained by the facts of the case. The Senator from Louisiana knows that I have been arraigned for making the statement I have made in regard to the depth of this channel, but I am sustained fully by the Engineer Department of the United States.

I shall say no more except that the Senator from Louisiana says that the business men of New Orleans say it is a success, and yet I ask him if it is not a fact that nine years after the jetties were made compared with nine years before there was a great falling off in the commerce of New Orleans?

Mr. EUSTIS. Does the Senator attribute that to the jetties?

Mr. VAN WYCK. If they were a benefit to commerce where is the success? I do not know that it is attributable to the jetties, but it is a fact that after the jetties were made the commerce of New Orleans decreased very largely in exports and imports; and if the heaviest vessels can pass through these jetties will the Senator tell me why it is a fact if it is a fact that much of the cotton of New Orleans finds its way to Liverpool by the way of New York?

Mr. EUSTIS. I will answer the question if the Senator will inform me what that has to do with the jetties.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I was only asking for the fact. Is that the fact, that the commerce of New Orleans, after the jetties were constructed, diminished; that the exports and imports then diminished? The additional fact is admitted, because the Senator does not deny it, that the cotton of Louisiana contiguous to New Orleans is carried to Liverpool cheaper by the way of New York than by New Orleans. Why? Because the heaviest draught vessels which it was supposed would enter New Orleans can not do it. That is the reason, because vessels of heavy draught can not enter that harbor as they can enter the harbor of New York. That accounts for it.

The claim that this channel is such as was contemplated by the law, and that it has brought the benefit which is claimed, seems not to be so, because the jetties do not produce the results which we had a right to expect they would.

That is all I desire to say, except one word more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY). The question is——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am not through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator had concluded and was sitting down.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Oh, no, I do not think the Chair thought so; he knew differently.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair heard the Senator from Nebraska make some remark to the effect that that was all he had to say, and the Chair, thinking he was sitting down, proceeded to state the pending question. The Senator from Nebraska, the Chair takes the liberty of saying, in his present position, has no right as a Senator or a gentleman to make the remark he did.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That does not interfere with my saying it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no doubt of that.

Mr. HOAR. I call the Senator from Nebraska to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will take his seat. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. The point of order is that the Senator from Nebraska is not justified in the remark he made to the Chair when the Chair stated that he thought the Senator had concluded he believed the Chair thought something different.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. The Chair cares nothing about pursuing the matter any further if the Senator from Nebraska desires to go on.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Only one word more. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] suggested that the outlet system was entirely wrong, and read the report of General Gillmore for the purpose of sustaining the proposition, and said that of that there could be no possible doubt.

The proposition, as I understood the letter of General Gillmore, was that the Mississippi River was injured by allowing the water to escape from it. I supposed the whole object and purpose of the improvement of the Mississippi River was to allow the speedy escape of the water, because it was the damming up and throwing back of the water which produced injury to commerce upon the river and produced destruction of property along the banks of the river. And yet, strange as it may appear, the position is taken that the river is injured if the water is allowed to escape by the outlet system.

The theory of Captain Eads and his associates is, as I understand, that the water of the Mississippi River must be compelled to pass through the jetties to scour and deepen them, and yet I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he remembers now about the amount of water of the Mississippi that passes through the jetties? I understand about two-tenths of the water of the Mississippi River passes through the jetties, and the other eight-tenths escapes without passing through the jetties. There is no scouring or deepening process with those waters, and the escape of the waters that do not pass through the jetties is an injury how? By damming up and closing up and retarding the escape of the waters? The theory in the letter of General Gillmore, whom I respect equally with the Senator from Louisiana, is that the escape of these waters preventing their passing through the jetties necessarily shows the danger of the outlet system!

All I desire to say in that connection is that it is not a conceded and admitted fact. That is a position disputed by eminent engineers in the Army. While General Gillmore holds that the effect is to shoal the water below the outlet, other engineers equally as eminent say that that is not the effect. In 1882 when that subject was under examination General Humphreys was asked his opinion upon that point.

The question propounded to him—

Whether, where outlets are formed on the river, there is a shoaling of the channel below those outlets, whether such an outlet slackens or accelerates the current, and shoals or does not shoal the river below.

General Humphreys said:

That matter was very carefully examined into by myself when I took charge of the surveys of the Mississippi River in 1850. There is not a single fact that goes to show that any shoaling whatever has been made below any of those crevasses. The Bonnet Carré crevasse was a great one, and it was stated that the river had shoaled below the crevasse, but the measurements showed that it had not, and that the bottom there was of hard clay, and was permanent. Those cross-sections have been repeated from time to time, and have been found substantially the same. The river has eaten a little into the east bank, but the cross-sections remain of the same dimensions, character, and depth.

I merely read that for the purpose of showing that the charge that in the outlet system there is necessarily a shoaling below the crevasse is not necessarily so, because it is a question upon which eminent engineers differ, and while General Gillmore, an eminent engineer, insists that it is so, other engineers entertain a different opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. CAMDEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired on this amendment with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. He would vote for the amendment, if present, and I should vote against it.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired on this amendment with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). This amendment it was announced was offered by the Senator from Kansas. May I ask which Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Mr. INGALLS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. SPOONER (when Mr. SAWYER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not know how my colleague would vote on this question if present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HAMPTON. My colleague, [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOM. If it is in order now, I propose an amendment on page 58. I think there will be no objection to it on the part of the committee. In line 1402, after words "of the," I move to strike out "bar at the mouth of Whipple Creek" and insert "bars at the mouth of Whipple Creek and of Hamburg Bay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

Mr. CULLOM. Hamburg is a little bay on the river.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, after the words "of the," in line 1402, the words "bar at the mouth of Whipple Creek" and insert "bars at the mouth of Whipple Creek and Hamburg Bay."

Mr. CULLOM. I think there will be no objection to that on the part of the committee.

Mr. MILLER. Is it in the engineer's report?

Mr. CULLOM. I think it is. It is a small affair anyway.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to amend in line 1438 by inserting after the word "channel" "but not below the reaches of the river which are being improved by them."

Mr. GIBSON. I hope that amendment will be voted down.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to say that I learn that I misunderstood what the purport of the remarks of the presiding officer were a short time ago. I certainly did not intend to say anything offensive to him above any man in the Senate. Therefore I withdraw any statement I may have made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1438, after the word "channel," it is proposed to insert "but not below the reaches of the river which are being improved by them;" so as to read:

Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if, in their judgment, it should be done as part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel, but not below the reaches of the river which are being improved by them.

Mr. GIBSON. That amendment imposes conditions upon the Mississippi River Commission that are in line with the minority reports signed by the Senator from Indiana when he was a member of the commission and by General Comstock, who was also a member of the commission, and which were rejected by every member of the commission except those two gentlemen.

This amendment imposes upon the commission a restriction which, in effect, substitutes the Senate of the United States and their judgment of the proper method by which the Mississippi River may be improved, their opinion with respect to the methods and instrumentalities that may be employed by this commission, in lieu of the judgment and opinion of the commission itself.

I submit to the Senate if we have selected men who are experienced in engineering, men who are experts in hydraulics, men who have given years of their lives to the investigation of the phenomena of the Mississippi River and have Congress after Congress submitted their reports, which have been indorsed year after year by appropriations, whether it is proper, whether it is consistent with reason, that the Senate of the United States should interpose and say to the commission, "You shall not adopt this plan for the improvement of this great river, but instead of the plan that you propose you shall adopt some other plan, that you have rejected, but which we, the Senate of the United States, intend that you shall attempt to execute in the improvement of this river."

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Has it been ten minutes since the Senator from Louisiana himself voted to overrule the reports of this commission and to impose upon them a limitation according to the view of Captain Eads as to the revetment of the banks?

Mr. GIBSON. I admit that with respect to the revetment of the banks of the Mississippi River I joined with a minority of the Senate in directing that that plan should be suspended, because Captain Eads, who was the author of the jetties and whose plan has succeeded in controlling and mastering the forces of the Mississippi River, advised in the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas that the revetment plan might be postponed because it was expensive, and it might turn out that the plan of contraction which has been adopted by the Mississippi River Commission might prove to be in itself a perfect and complete plan without the additional one of revetment. But I did not propose to instruct the Mississippi River Commission that they should not adopt the plan of revetment at all events.

I voted merely to postpone the revetment system until they had tried effectually the plan of contraction. But that very amendment proposed that they should have on the banks of the river in these reaches what are called dikes or levees, and the whole theory upon which the Mississippi River Commission proceeds is that of restraining the volume of the water in the channel of the Mississippi River so that we may increase the velocity of the current and thus scour out the river and bear this burden to the sea. And the attempt here on the part of the Senate to say to this commission, "You shall not execute the plan that you propose to the Senate; you shall not execute the plan that you have agreed upon, but you shall execute in lieu of it the plan that a minority of the commission have agreed upon, that plan which the commission itself has rejected." It is the very plan that the Senator from Indiana now proposes that that commission shall execute without condition or restriction. So that there is no analogy between the vote which I gave restraining the commission for the time being from the execution of the revetment system and that which he proposes now, which says to this commission, "You shall not adopt the very plan which you submitted to the Senate as the proper one for the improvement of the Mississippi River."

I desire here to state that this whole scheme relates not to the banks of the river. There is not one word in the bill creating the Mississippi River Commission that gives it any jurisdiction over the banks of the river, that allows it to concern itself in any degree with the protection of the people from floods. They have nothing to do under the bill creating the Mississippi River Commission with the protection of the alluvial lands from overflow, with the building of levees or jetties or dikes to protect the people in the valley from overflow—nothing in the world.

The bill recites in its very title that it creates a commission to do what? To improve the river. That is the purpose of the bill, and the plan which has been submitted by the commission is to improve the river, and I say to Senators here that it will not do for them to interpose their judgment in respect to the plans that have been adopted by this commission and to say to them, "The very plan that you brought here under the responsibilities of the position which you occupy to improve this river the Senate goes back upon; it rejects; and in lieu of this we substitute another plan." We say, "This is the plan of the Senate; we have willed that you shall follow it; but the plan which you brought here we will shall be rejected."

Senators, you must adhere to the general plan proposed by the commission. Otherwise why should we constitute a commission of engineers and experts? What reason can there be to organize a body of men who have been educated to deal with the phenomena of the Mississippi River, whose plan has been shown here to-day to be a successful one, who have given deep water where there was shallow water, who have emancipated the trade and commerce of this great highway, and now just as they are midway in their course the Senate of the United States, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, interposes its knowledge, its experience, its will, and subverts, in point of fact, the commission itself? You might as well take this commission and throw it in the floods of the Mississippi River as to pass this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Indiana whether the effect of this amendment is not to prevent the repairing or building of any levees south of Lake Providence.

Mr. HARRISON. Lake Providence, I believe, is the lowest reach they are improving; yes, sir.

Mr. EUSTIS. That is the effect of it?

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose it would be. There are no shoals below Lake Providence, I believe, that they are working upon.

Mr. EUSTIS. It seems to me that this amendment is inconsistent with the provisions of the bill as regards the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River. In the first place, it is expressly provided—

That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands or private property by overflows.

That is an express prohibition to the river commission, that for the purpose merely of protecting lands which are liable to overflow, regardless of the question of the improvability of the navigation of the Mississippi River, they are not authorized under this act to expend a single dollar. I assume, of course, that that provision of the law will be strictly obeyed by the commission.

Now, if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana be adopted it prohibits the Mississippi River Commission from repairing or building levees, which they may consider as part of their plan to improve the navigation and commerce of the Mississippi River.

The Senator from Indiana certainly did not state in the short speech that he made before that he disapproved of the levee system as an adjunct to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River. I understood that he expressly reserved his judgment upon that question, and he frankly stated that that was an unsolved problem. Now, if the river commission should determine that below Lake Providence Point it is necessary to keep the Mississippi River within its channel by one system or by another in order to improve or to preserve the navigation of that river, it seems to me that the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is to impair the efficiency of that commission, not only to restrain its discretion and to destroy its scientific judgment, but it is a declaration by the Senate of the United States that even if it be necessary to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River south of Lake Providence, even if it be absolutely essential as a scientific question to be determined by this commission that a levee south of that point should be repaired or builded although it might improve the navigation of the river and possibly be the very best investment that could be made under this appropriation, yet under the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana there is an absolute and peremptory prohibition to the commission that it shall surrender its judgment and surrender its responsibility, and not a solitary dollar of this large appropriation shall be so used, because the Senate of the United States, and the House if it adopts it, prohibit it. I say, Mr. President, that the amendment presents an irreconcilable inconsistency with the whole theory and purpose of this appropriation.

The Senator complained that an amendment was offered which represented the contraction system, the Eads system; and yet he himself proposes by his amendment to restrict the commission to a system which is antagonistic and hostile to the levee system though in the judgment of that commission that should be the most appropriate way of dedicating the money which is appropriated under this bill.

There is another objection to which I desire to call his attention. The Government of the United States under previous appropriations adopted the suggestions and the schemes which were proposed by the river commission in previous years and have builded levees. Those levees have been built south of Lake Providence. They have cost millions of dollars, I may say, in all the riparian States. There stands the investment of the Government of the United States in those great works which have been constructed by this river commission with the public money appropriated by Congress and under a system which has received the sanction of Congress. Is it possible that the honorable Senator intends that those magnificent works so constructed shall be exposed to the danger of destruction and that this river commission shall not have the power to expend a single dollar to save those levees or to repair them against the floods of the Mississippi River; that they are to stand by and see those levees swept away, the work of years and the work of millions of dollars disappear, as it were, as they might do in a night's time? Yet under this amendment as proposed by the Senator from Indiana not a solitary dollar of this money could be used to protect, to preserve, or to save those levees, but they would disappear, being washed away by the floods of the Mississippi River.

Whom would that benefit? To whose advantage would that accrue? To the Government of the United States to have millions of dollars of money which have been invested under the sanction of Congress wasted and disappear simply for the reason that the Congress of the United States, if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana be adopted, has absolutely and peremptorily prohibited the commission from expending a solitary dollar to save these great public works from destruction by the floods of the Mississippi. I will tell the honorable Senator that a levee that may have cost a million or a million and a half of dollars can be saved sometimes by the expenditure of a few hundred or a few thousand dollars at the proper time. I can tell the honorable Senator that some of the greatest levees that have been built in Louisiana have disappeared sometimes in twenty-four hours for the reason that preventive measures had not been taken in order to save and preserve those levees.

I ask him whether he will take the responsibility before the country of saying that those great works which have been constructed shall stand at their own peril, and that the Government and the people of the United States have no longer any interest in those magnificent works which have been constructed at such an expenditure of money and under the sanction of the Congress of the United States?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I intended by this amendment to present distinctly and squarely the question whether the Senate was ready to enter upon the work of the construction of levees beginning at the mouth of the Mississippi and extending up to Cairo. That is the suggestion contained in the report of the commission which I read. This amendment will decide the question, so far as the Senate can decide it, whether we shall enter upon that work.

We are making an appropriation here that will not go very far. In the bill as it came to us from the House the expenditure of this money was limited to two reaches on the river, Lake Providence and Plum Point. The amount was supposed to be wholly necessary for that work. It would be entirely inadequate to build the levees alone below these points. It is not sufficient in itself to complete the works at Plum Point and Lake Providence. Now, what use shall we make of it?

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the president of the Mississippi River Commission says that those works are completed just as far as the commission desires to complete them. He has 12 feet of water in one and 15 feet in the other, and he says that under no circumstances should the commission be limited to those works, because they are completed as far as he desires to complete them.

Mr. HARRISON. Then may I ask the Senator from Louisiana what other reaches they propose to enter upon the improvement of?

Mr. GIBSON. They propose to enter upon the improvement of the New Madrid reach.

Mr. HARRISON. Very good.

Mr. GIBSON. And the other reaches.

Mr. HARRISON. Very good. New Madrid is above Lake Providence.

Mr. GIBSON. I submit to the Senator from Indiana that the commission does not propose to limit itself to any particular reaches, but proposes to treat the whole river.

Mr. HARRISON. Neither do I propose to limit the commission as to where they shall do work on that river in the direction of rectifying any defect in its navigation. If my amendment is adopted they will be left entirely free to choose any point on the river where there is now defective navigation and to address themselves to its improvement. They will be left entirely free to build levees along that reach, to build levees above that reach if they please; and certainly neither of the Senators from Louisiana will claim that the work of improving the New Madrid reach will be helped by building levees on the lower river. The commission themselves do not pretend that it will have any relation to their work of improvement, but simply that it will tend to counteract the injurious effects resulting from levees built at or above the points which have been improved.

Mr. GIBSON. The Senator from Indiana surely could not have read the last report of the commission.

Mr. HARRISON. I have it here before me.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not propose to answer, or to try to answer, all the objections which the Senator from Indiana may have against the plan of the Mississippi River Commission. I believe that the Senator from Indiana is committed against that plan; that he was committed against it at the outset when he was a member of the commission, and that he is committed against it now.

But I desire to say to the Senator that that plan rests upon the system of contraction, which means, in effect, holding within the river all the water of the river, so that the velocity may be increased, the friction diminished, the scouring power of the current re-enforced, and that no matter what instrumentalities the commission may require, whether they be jetties, or dikes, or restraining walls, in order to execute this plan, which is the plan of contraction, I for one feel disposed to vote for it.

I desire to say, with the permission of the Senator from Indiana, that but two plans have ever been suggested for the treatment of the Mississippi River. One is the outlet plan, which is to take the water out of the river; and the other is the plan of contraction, which is to keep the water in the river. If jetties be necessary to this latter plan, if levees be necessary, if restraining walls or dikes be necessary, as they are necessary on the Rhine and on the Rhone and as they were necessary at the mouth of the Mississippi River, it seems to me to be the part of wisdom to allow the Mississippi River Commission to adopt these instrumentalities, call them what we may. But to say here that we are in favor of the plan of contraction and opposed to the outlet system, and yet to deny to the Mississippi River Commission the instrumentalities that it should employ to execute the plan of contraction, seems to me to be child's play; and I can not imagine how any one who favors the plan of contraction can vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, which, while approving on principle the very system which has been presented to us by the Mississippi River Commission, yet denies to that commission the means and methods and instrumentalities which it may adopt in order to execute that system.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand the Senator from Louisiana. What has the contraction of the water way to do with the reaches of the river below Lake Providence? Where do you want to contract it? The purpose of contraction is to scour a sufficient depth of water throughout the whole river. Below there we have an ample depth of water. We do not want any contraction there. The contraction needed is upon these reaches where we have low water, like New Madrid, Lake Providence, Plum Point, and perhaps others. These are above the point he wants to levee. You do not need any scouring down there; you have plenty of depth. You do not levee down there to get scour; you do not levee it to contract the water; you levee it down there simply to prevent the injurious effects of levees built higher up the river; and that is what the commission say.

Mr. KENNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. KENNA. I should like to ask for information if a greater depth of water should be needed below has not the commission full discretion under its general powers to improve that section of the river?

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KENNA. Would it not have under your amendment power to build levees, if necessary, as part of the plan of that improvement?

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly. If there should develop on any part of the lower river the Senator from Louisiana has been talking about a shoal place, a bar, and they entered upon the work of improvement, they could build levees there and get the scour. Ah, Mr. President, it is not scour they want down there; it is levees; and not levees to deepen the channel. It is deep enough for any navigation that it has ever been called upon to bear. It is levees that are wanted, and levees for protection. The commission themselves put the building of levees toward the mouth of the river distinctly upon the ground that it is to protect the lands against an increased flood-height caused by building levees up the river.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Do I understand that it is proposed to build these levees lower down to guard against the danger of damage to the land along the river which has been caused by the construction of levees at points where navigation needs to be improved?

Mr. HARRISON. To prevent damage which they apprehend may result from levees built higher up.

Mr. BLAIR. I refer to levees built up the river.

Mr. HARRISON. Built by the commission higher up, which they apprehend may have such a result.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the Senator a question for my own information. Do I understand that his amendment is intended to prevent the reasonably apprehended disastrous effect of improvements made under the law by the commission at higher points up the river?

Mr. HARRISON. I am free to say to the Senator that I do not believe there are such effects, and the commission have not said so, but they apprehend such effects if they continue their levee system up the river to the extent that may be contemplated.

Mr. CALL. I would ask the Senator if he proposes to deprive the commission of any power to prevent the evil effects of work which has been done under their authority in destroying the lives and property of the people who may be upon the river?

Mr. HARRISON. I answer very promptly that I do not believe the construction of the levees up the river which threaten the result which they talk about is necessary to the improvement of the river at those points, or that it is necessary to carry them to any such height as to produce such a result.

Mr. CALL. Then I understand the Senator's amendment is predicated upon such a degree of confidence in his own judgment upon that subject that he will not allow any means of preventing the possibility of an error or mistake upon his part.

Mr. HARRISON. I mean just this, that if the commission in order to carry out their scheme of levees higher up the river as an aid to the channel works in increasing the depth of water believe that it is necessary in order to accomplish that to levee the whole river, then I do not agree with them.

As Professor Mitchell, one of the ablest men on that commission, says, we ought not to undertake the leveeing of 270 miles of good river, with plenty of water in it, until we have tested the experiments above and proved it to be necessary. I say that is a wise suggestion, and I want to know if any one here, who has not an overwhelming interest, by reason of the situation of his constituency, in the construction of these levees would not agree with the suggestion that before we undertake the construction of 270 miles, protecting the river on both banks by levees where necessary, we should not first demonstrate that the works above can be accomplished without the levees there, and, secondly, whether the effect of using levees there is not to put in peril property on the lower river.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I quite agree with the Senator in opposition to appropriating money to build levees on the Mississippi or any other river to protect the private land-holder on either bank, but if it is necessary to build levees on the upper river to an extent that will produce an increase of flood-height that overflows as a necessary consequence the delta below, does he deny the power and right and duty to protect the country below from the consequence of its act above?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not of course deny that if we produce an increased flood-height below it would be entirely appropriate that we should guard the people there against it; but I deny that it has been demonstrated that that is the result, and I deny that the construction of levees above is necessary to such an extent in order to scour the channel, as to justify us in starting in now, before it has been demonstrated to be necessary, to build a double levee 270 miles long from the Gulf up, and start that out of an appropriation here that is inadequate to other necessary work.

The New Madrid reach is to be improved, and other places where there is low water are to be improved, and yet the Senators from Louisiana want to have the provision left so that the entire appropriation may be employed in building levees, starting at the mouth of the river upward.

The Senator from Louisiana who sits nearest me [Mr. EUSTIS] made a suggestion that I think is entitled to weight, and I propose, therefore, to suggest a modification of my amendment to enable the commission below the point that they are improving to prevent or close a crevasse which may threaten injury to the work that they have done. I agree that that suggestion is pertinent and I adopt it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Now, I should like to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. EUSTIS. Of course the Senator having been on this commission I have to defer a great deal to his knowledge of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARRISON. I learned very little there.

Mr. EUSTIS. I have tried to learn something about it myself. The Senator has an idea, evidently, that from a certain given point on the Mississippi River you find a deep, navigable river, and consequently that there is no use to have the commission instructed to build levees or to do any work to improve the navigation of the river, which is already sufficient. I take it that that is the idea in the Senator's mind.

Mr. HARRISON. Where there is navigation already sufficient and which is not threatened.

Mr. EUSTIS. That is true, you may say, for a series of years when we are not visited with any extraordinarily high floods; but I wish to make it manifest to the Senator's mind how utterly untenable his position is when owing to high floods at the points of which he speaks the Mississippi River, instead of being 1 mile wide, is 40 miles wide.

Mr. HARRISON. Still the channel is deep enough.

Mr. EUSTIS. I beg your pardon; I was going to ask what becomes of the channels of the Mississippi River then? As good a pilot as you might be, sir, you could not find them. The whole nature and character of that river is thereby changed, and what was good navigation becomes dangerous and difficult navigation, owing to the fact that the river has been widened from 1 mile to 40 miles and where you had lands those very lands may be in the middle of the river. I have myself seen often a house and a plantation which was a riparian plantation in the middle of the Mississippi River and the channel miles away from where it originally was.

The proposition I wish to submit to the honorable Senator is this: If that be true, and I know it to be true, when such a flood occurs as we had in 1882, despise if you please and scorn the levees, laugh if you please at this system of contraction, you will have a system of expansion that will cost the Government of the United States millions of dollars where it would cost thousands if you allowed the river commission to build levees where they thought it was necessary.

It is an erroneous idea to suppose that the people who inhabit the Mississippi River are asking Congress to build these levees merely for the protection of their homes and their lands. I myself would respect that appeal, I would heed it from whomsoever it might come; but I say that that is not the fact. Those people understand the regimen of that river. Those who are interested in its navigation understand its caprices and its eccentricities; and no doctor ever lived who had such a difficult patient to deal with as those scientific engineers have to deal with in solving the problem of the navigability of the Mississippi River.

I know that the honorable Senator does not wish to be unjust to this measure. I accept him as the friend and coadjutor in this great work of improving the Mississippi River, and I tell him that you have to guard against these extraordinary and devastating floods, which not only destroy the works but destroy the very nature and character of that river; and you will spend millions and millions of dollars, in my judgment, where by spending a few thousand dollars you could not only protect that country from overflow but improve the navigation of the river by the levee system.

Mr. HARRISON. The lower river is subject to the contingency. I agree that a great crevasse may be formed which will draw a sufficient body of the main river to diminish the slope, and hence the velocity, of the stream below, and that may result in deposits below the crevasse. That is the only peril to which the lower part of the river is subject. Over and over again in these reports the Mississippi River Commission have said that navigation on that part of the river did not need any improvement; that there was an ample depth of water.

In high water, of course, navigation is dangerous in times of flood. Channels may change somewhat by reason of a flood; nevertheless there is an abundant depth of water. There are no shoals; there are no bars to be removed; and hence the building of levees for the purpose of getting more erosion, as the other Senator from Louisiana claimed, is entirely unnecessary on the lower part of the river.

In my amendment I propose that wherever the commission undertake to improve the river from Cairo clear down to the passes, at any point where they think navigation needs improvement and have set about to improve the work of navigation, I put no limit on their power to build levees there if they want to do so as part of their work. I only say that they shall not go below the points they are improving (and I have added to my amendment the words) "unless it shall be necessary to prevent or close an injurious crevasse." With that amendment we would provide that they shall not enter upon a general system of building levees below the point that they are improving, but that if a crevasse is threatened that is likely to draw off the water in such a way as to injure navigation, or if a crevassse occurs in the levees likely to produce such a result, they shall have power to prevent its breaking through or to close it if it is open.

Mr. EUSTIS. Read the modification of the amendment again, if you please.

Mr. HARRISON. I propose to make it read that they shall not have power to build levees below unless it shall be necessary to prevent or close an injurious crevasse.

Mr. EUSTIS. That modification is satisfactory to me, Mr. President, as compared with the original proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. That entirely relieves us of the idea that this money is to be spent to build a general system of levees down there, and at the same time it leaves the commission free, if a crevasse threatens to injure navigation, to close it up.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope the amendment will be voted down and that this restriction will not be placed upon the Mississippi River Commission. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate, but I regard it as a very injurious and injudicious amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. After the word "channel," in line 1438, it is proposed to add:

But not below the reaches of the river which are being improved by them, unless it shall be necessary to prevent or close an injurious crevasse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana calls for a division.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest to the Senator that that is not necessary. This very bill provides for work at New Orleans, and that is low enough down to cover all he desires. It is not Lake Providence at all, but the work below. There is a special appropriation for improving the river at New Orleans.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Michigan can not get away with this amendment on that suggestion, although it is adroit. The object is to prevent the construction of levees below the reaches which are being improved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana demand a division?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. I do not propose to make a speech on this subject at all, but I wish to say that I do not appreciate the force of an argument where there are two methods of making a great public improvement upon a river, and one of them has the incidental effect of protecting the lives and property of the people of the United States, that we should exclude the method which has the incidental effect of benefiting everybody. For one, I do not see any difference between the benefits which are to come to the people from the improvement of navigation and the benefits which are to come to them from preventing the destruction of their lives and their property. I shall vote to allow the commission the utmost latitude; but I wish to say that for one in all measures of public importance I shall consider the incidental advantages which will come to the people, and that that will be no objection to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division has been called for on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce. Senators in favor of the amendment will stand until they are counted.

There were, on a division, ayes 22.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senator from Louisiana will withdraw the call for a further count. It is evident that the amendment is carried.

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. If in order I should like to propose an amendment on page 58 by striking out lines 1421, 1422, 1423, and 1424 and inserting what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out from line 1421 to line 1424, inclusive, as follows:

And the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, use so much of said sum of $500,000 as may be necessary to correct the current of the river and improve the channel at Saint Louis—

And to insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, use not to exceed $100,000 of said sum of $500,000 to correct the current of the river and improve the channel at Saint Louis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the amendment to the amendment ought to be adopted, because under the provision of the amendment as it stands the whole amount might be expended at Saint Louis if the Secretary of War ordered it, and all the other improvements itemized there would be neglected entirely, and they are all very important. I understand the importance of the improvements opposite Saint Louis, but at the same time I do not want all the money that is appropriated to go to that one spot. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] I think is familiar with that portion of the amendment, and I do not observe him here.

Mr. CULLOM. The chairman of the committee can see very clearly just all that there is of it, unless the committee are willing that the Secretary of War shall appropriate the whole sum opposite Saint Louis. I think it is but fair that the improvement at Saint Louis should be limited to one-fifth of the amount appropriated to the several improvements.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri is here now.

Mr. CULLOM. As the Senator from Missouri has come in I will repeat what I said a moment ago. A provision of the amendment made by the Committee on Commerce leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of War to expend the whole $500,000 opposite Saint Louis. I do not think that is exactly fair for the other points along the river between the mouth of the Illinois and the mouth of the Ohio River at Cairo. So I have proposed an amendment to limit the amount to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War to $100,000 at the point opposite Saint Louis.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment without objection will be agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1465, to reduce the appropriation "for survey of the Mississippi River from the head of the passes to its headwaters: Continuing survey," from $75,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I wish to move an amendment to section 2.

Mr. CALL. I desire to know if all the amendments of the committee have been acted upon and if the bill is now open to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; only the amendments of the committee to section 1 have been acted upon.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent that on all amendments hereafter debate be limited to five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that in the further consideration of this bill debate be limited under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. I do not think it will be possible for me to say about section 2 what I wish to say in five minutes, but so desirous am I of pushing along the business of the Senate that I shall not make an objection. I will contrive to say what I wish to say in five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out section 2 of the bill. It goes much further than ever any river and harbor bill attempted to go before. It does not deal with defects in rivers and harbors alone, and the jurisdiction of the United States upon such rivers and upon such defects where they arise, but amplifies and takes charge in effect and in purpose of nearly every stream, great or small, in the United States.

Section 2 provides penalties against the acts of citizens dumping obstacles named in the section not only into navigable rivers where Congress appropriates money, thereby extending the jurisdiction of the United States over those rivers, but it extends it to every affluent and tributary, and thereby ousts the States' jurisdiction. I object to that.

Looking further along in the bill I find that having in section 2 asserted this general and exclusive jurisdiction, it carries out the legitimate principle of that assertion and declares in the subsequent sections that all questions of bridging streams or the affluents where they are appropriated for by Congress shall be in the United States, and that works erected hundreds and thousands of miles from these improvements may after a short notice be destroyed by the Secretary of War.

I am opposed to all of that section. It is exercising a jurisdiction never attempted before. Sir, in my own State there is not a little stream that helps to make up a river that is not by these sections taken control of by the United States and made subject to their jurisdiction. There is not a lake in our borders that is not so seized and grappled by this bill, for those lakes are all reservoirs and tributaries of a river. It destroys the jurisdiction of every State over these small streams.

In my State in its legislative councils there are committees upon interior waters, upon ways and bridges, and water highways; but if the amendments which are reported here and the provisions of the House are carried out there are no interior waters in Maine or in any other State; the jurisdiction of the Legislature is destroyed. I do not believe that Congress or the American people are prepared to go to any such extent.

We deal in the State of Maine as a State with questions pertaining to the welfare of our people. We deal with the school, with the jury-box, with the courts, but just the same we deal with roads and bridges and water highways; and everything of that kind is taken away by these sections.

I am not one of those who are particularly afraid of the exercise of the national jurisdiction and powers over great subjects; but, sir, something has been left to the States and something ought to be left to the States. If the provisions which have been embodied in this bill by the other branch and assented to by the Senate Committee on Commerce were carried out, then all these great subjects with which the State ought to deal are found to be nothing but shifting sands, disappearing before the greedy and devouring march of central authority. I object to that.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Maine, before he sits down, to make his motion to strike out all the sections down to and including section 7.

Mr. HALE. I will make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Maine that his amendment is not now in order.

Mr. HALE. For what reason?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the agreement made in advance, the amendments offered by the Senate Commerce Committee are first to be acted upon.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that this question may be acted upon now. It certainly should be given, as the matter has been discussed, and it should be settled now rather than to go back.

Mr. BUTLER. Before that is done, I should like to suggest to my friend from Maine that he enlarge the scope of his amendment to some extent so that it will have the effect of striking out everything including section 2 down to section 9.

Mr. HALE. I was going to make the motion, if some other Senator did not, to strike out the sections section by section, but the suggestion is better. As these features are not essential to a river and harbor appropriation bill, I will, by the consent of the Senate, make my amendment apply to all the sections, including section 2 and going down to section 7. That covers the whole subject-matter of this vast amplification of central jurisdiction.

Mr. BUTLER. Down to section 9, I would suggest.

Mr. CONGER. If section 2 should be stricken out by the Senate it may be restored by the House or fail in conference. It should be corrected in accordance with the views of the committee, if the committee's views are of any importance, so that if it be stricken out it will be in a condition for the committee of conference to act upon it in proper form. I hope, therefore, that the committee amendments, which are not very numerous, may first be acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both under the agreement and under the well-settled principles of parliamentary law the amendments proposed by the committee to perfect the text before these sections could be stricken out would take precedence, and the amendment of the Senator from Maine would not be in order at this time.

Mr. HALE. If the rule then is to be enforced I give notice that when the Senate shall have ceased to consider amendments to section 2 I shall seek the floor for the purpose of moving to strike it out, unless it is so changed that I can accept it.

Mr. CULLOM. The rule requires that we shall go through the bill and act on the committee's amendments first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Maine I think is in order as a pending amendment, but not only the amendments reported by the committee perfecting the text but any amendment that any Senator may choose to offer tending to perfect the part to be stricken out must take precedence in the vote that is to be taken.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly, if the rule is enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question first is upon the amendments of the committee to section 2 of the bill. The first amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 9, after "United States," the committee report to strike out "whereby navigation might be impeded;" so as to read:

It shall not be lawful to cast, throw, empty, or unlade, or cause, suffer, or procure to be cast, thrown, emptied, or unladen, either from or out of any ship, vessel, lighter, barge, boat, or other craft, or from the shore, pier, wharf, or mills of any kind whatever, any ballast, stone, slate, gravel, earth, slack, rubbish, wreck, filth, slabs, edgings, sawdust, slag, or cinders, or other refuse or mill-waste of any kind, into any port, road, roadstead, harbor, haven, navigable river, or other waters of the United States for the improvement of which Congress has already made, or may hereafter make, appropriations, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. HALE. No; I certainly hope that the amendment will not be agreed to. The House of Representatives was more conservative in these sweeping provisions than the Senate committee has been, because the House in passing the bill limited the effect of this proposed legislation to cases of citizens putting obstructive matter in streams far up, where navigation might be impeded by such an act; but if this amendment of the Committee on Commerce be adopted this act of the citizen, whether any consequence could be traced to it or not, no matter how harmless it might be in its result, would subject him to the penalties of section 6. So I hope the Senate will not, in considering this section of the bill, agree to the amendment reported by the committee, and I hope the committee will not insist upon it.

Mr. KENNA. If the Senator from Maine will observe upon page 62, at line 26, he will find the words "and become an obstruction to navigation."

Mr. HALE. But that only applies to a certain specific character of obstacles thrown in, while this is a general provision.

Mr. KENNA. That clause applies to the whole section.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it does.

Mr. KENNA. The words "whereby navigation might be impeded" were stricken out for the very reason that the bare possibility that navigation might be impeded ought not to condemn the action.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion which I think will suit the committee and the Senate?

Mr. KENNA. If I have made myself clear about the object of the committee in making the amendment I have nothing further to say.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Senator is right. Even if he is, the words put in by the House which are proposed to be stricken out ought to be kept in; because they only agree with the construction which the Senator from West Virginia places upon the section.

Mr. KENNA. With this qualification, that the words on page 62, line 26, provide absolutely that the act shall amount to an obstruction before it is inhibited, whereas on page 61 the words which the Senator from Maine objects to being stricken out simply deal with the possibility that the navigation could be affected.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me these words had better be stricken out, even taking the view which the Senator from Maine takes, because they are very imperfect—"whereby navigation might be impeded." I propose, if they are stricken out, to insert in lieu of them the words "to the substantial injury of navigation," and then to insert in the twelfth line, after the word "or," so that it will qualify the whole following clause, "to such injury;" so as to read:

Or to such injury to dump, discharge, or wash, or cause to be dumped, &c.

Mr. HALE. I think that covers the purpose in view.

Mr. KENNA. I think there will be no objection to that modification.

Mr. HALE. I agree to that amendment for one.

Mr. DOLPH. There is no objection on my part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out insert the words "to the substantial injury of navigation;" and after the word "or," in line 12, to insert the words "to such injury;" so as to read:

Or other waters of the United States, to the substantial injury of navigation, for the improvement of which Congress has already made, or may hereafter make, appropriations, or to such injury to dump, discharge, or wash, or cause to be dumped, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. VEST. The Committee on Commerce very deliberately after the discussion struck out the words "whereby navigation might be impeded." "Might be impeded." No lawyer could construct an issue of that sort and put it before a jury. How would you ever come to any conclusion as to whether navigation might be impeded or not?

Mr. HALE. Those words have been stricken out and the clause suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts has been adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has not been adopted.

Mr. HALE. I thought it had been adopted.

Mr. VEST. What other amendment has been adopted? I did not understand that an amendment had been adopted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment to the amendment be stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HOAR to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I rise to object. I wish to express my opinion of this section, and I might as well do it upon this motion as on any other. I think it is the most remarkable section that I have ever seen in a bill before this body.

First, undoubtedly the purpose is very laudable and praiseworthy, yet the extent to which this goes is I think beyond what was anticipated by the House of Representatives which draughted it. Take, for instance, the sixteenth line. After providing that nothing shall be deposited in any navigable stream to which the Government may appropriate money, we find the words:

Or into any tributary, branch, or affluent of such waters or rivers.

Under that the miner in the heights of the Rocky Mountains, clear up in the clouds, will be liable to be pestered and annoyed and arrested by some officer of the Government who comes around and tells him that he is putting débris into the stream that runs down into the Platte and ultimately in the Missouri and then into the Mississippi River. There is no end to this at all.

As was said by the Senator from Maine, it is the absolute control of all the water ways of the United States by the National Government. It is the most searching, centralizing grasp that the Government has ever attempted. How anybody who has any regard at all for local control can support it I can not conceive.

It is not necessary to preserve the water ways of the United States from destruction that any such act as this should be passed. It has not any place in this bill. It ought not to be here. If it is necessary that there should be legislation upon this subject it should come here in a separate bill; it should stand upon its merits, and not be attached to a large number of appropriations that a great number of Senators and Members are anxious to have passed, and where they may be willing to accept what is vicious legislation for the purpose of securing to themselves the benefits of some other portion of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator will allow me to call his attention to the amendment——

Mr. TELLER. I will if it does not come out of my time. I can not yield otherwise.

Mr. CONGER. I will not interfere with you. This is not an amendment the Senator is speaking to. The five-minute rule applies to amendments.

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking to the amendment or to the bill, just as the Senator chooses. I think it is absolutely indefensible, without justification and without excuse; and it will be used for the purpose of harassing and annoying, not in California alone, but in every other section of the country where men mine and wash gold from the earth. Take the mines in Western Colorado, one river running down into the Gulf of Mexico, the other into the Gulf of California, neither practically a navigable river, and yet both navigable within the eye of the law. Every miner who dumps a bushel of earth into an affluent of those streams is liable under this proposed law to the penalties herein provided.

Mr. CONGER. When by the process of mining which is prohibited here such rivers as the Sacramento and the Feather and the San Joaquin and any other rivers in the United States that have been navigable since their discovery up to within a few years have had their navigation destroyed, Congress has but one of two things to do, either to let the destruction go on and leave the river without appropriation or stop the filling up if possible. That is all I can say about it.

The bay of San Diego has been filling up so much that Congress made an appropriation of several thousand dollars to preserve the harbor of San Diego. We are asked to improve these rivers in California. There is no use in improving them if the hydraulic mines can pour down their millions of tons into the rivers and fill them up, as they have filled up a good portion now and are filling up the bay of San Francisco. We must either stop the improvements and let the rivers go or stop the injury to them. That seems to be a plain, practical question. The truth is, that not only are these rivers filled up, but fertile valleys along these rivers have been filled in many places to the depth of 5, 10, and as high as 20 feet, almost covering the houses and destroying the trees, the fences, and the tillage of the lands.

But there is no danger of any injury by this bill to the miners upon tributaries upon the top of the Rocky Mountains. The Senator from Colorado is visionary in that. He is not often visionary, and therefore I hail his poetic development to-day. This same bill provides that this shall not be considered to apply to any other character of mining than hydraulic, by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure. The miners who are at work up on the tributaries are in no danger under the provisions of this bill unless they use hydraulic mining through pipes and nozzles.

If this other provision of the committee amendment be acted upon and adopted, then it will relieve the Senator of all danger to the ordinary labor of the miner, either high up on the mountains or low down in the piedmont country, as he will see by looking at the amendment added by the committee to the second section, providing that nothing herein contained shall extend or—be so construed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining, by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure—

The limitation of the committee, I think, will guard against what the Senator apprehends—

And provided further, That in places where harbor-lines have not been established, and where such deposits can be made without injury to navigation, within lines to be established by the Secretary of War, said officer may, and is hereby authorized to, cause such lines to be established; and within such lines such deposits may be made, under regulations to be from time to time prescribed by him.

I think these two provisions inserted by the committee relieve the section of a great deal of the fear that it will interfere with the private rights of persons working upon tributaries or anywhere else, on the shore or on the tributaries. It was for that object that the committee carefully prepared this whole amendment in the two paragraphs I have read, to avoid the trouble and the difficulty and the injury to innocent workers by other means of washing and sluicing than by hydraulic pressure.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the trouble is that the provisions in these sections are in no degree confined to mining, but they extend out and absorb the control of small interior waters with reference to every vocation that the citizen may pursue upon them. The underlying defect in these provisions is that they reach out and grasp by the Federal authority the entire control of these interior waters. They deprive the State of jurisdiction; they leave nothing to the State.

All of these subjects, the treatments and methods which should be applied to the uses of smaller streams hundreds of miles in the country, ought to be left to the State Legislatures. The very feature that is most insisted upon in this bill, the popular want, and desire, and appreciation, backing up all these appropriations, ought to induce the Committee on Commerce to leave these things to the several States.

If the people of the United States believe in these appropriations, if they are beneficent, as is claimed, and in many cases and in most they may be so, then it is surely safe to leave with the authorities of the State, the Legislatures of the different States, the care and protection of these interior waters, these streams running from far back in the country down to the sea or to the great rivers into which they empty. It is a monstrous thing to report a bill which, like a devil-fish, reaches out its arms and tears and mangles every remnant of State jurisdiction left over these interior waters. The Senate ought not for a moment to harbor provisions that thus annihilate State jurisdiction. The Committee on Commerce in advocating this measure as a great popular measure ought not in it to take away from the people of the States their rights in controlling these streams. They will protect these upper streams apart from the places and the jurisdiction assumed by the General Government over the portions that are dealt with and appropriated for. If these provisions are wise and beneficent, public sentiment in those States will take care of this subject.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] could not have read this section with a great deal of care, or he would have seen that his suggestion that my opinion was visionary was not good. In the first place there are miners mining in the Rocky Mountains with pipes and nozzles who are not affecting injuriously the waters of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Then this bill does not hit them.

Mr. TELLER. It does hit them under the express provision of the committee, for having stricken out the provision that the dumping, &c., should be injurious to navigation, they have ex industria fixed it so that every miner on the top of the Rocky Mountains who is plying his legal avocation with a nozzle and pipe, as he has been doing for twenty years, and as he was invited to do by the Government of the United States, and as he bought the land of the Government of the United States for the purpose of doing, 600 miles, 700 miles, or a thousand miles from any navigable waters, is brought within the strict provisions of this law, if it ever should become a law.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator will read line 26 and two or three lines previous on page 62 he will find that he is in error.

Mr. TELLER. I have read every provision of the bill. The section provides at line 26 for what may become an obstruction to navigation; and it may be readily said that if the débris goes down the Blue River in Colorado (which has been tinged with the earth washed from the hills for twenty years) into the Rio Grande River or into the Gulf of California, it is impeding the progress of the commerce on that river by its deposits. It can be readily so said. Every community that throws its filth into the affluents of a great river is liable to be harassed and annoyed by the provisions of this bill.

Why could not the committee have confined the provision to that which would render navigation impossible, or difficult, or destroy it, or injure it in any sense? But as I said, they carefully struck out of the bill the words "whereby navigation might be impeded," insisting by their course that any throwing of dirt by the method at least of a nozzle or pipe into the affluent of a stream was to be a crime against the United States law.

The amendment on page 62 is an improvement, I admit. It is better than the original text; it has improved the section; but there are some things that I do not believe in, even in the amendment. The Secretary of War is to tell us where we may dump our tailings. The Secretary of War is to tell the mill-man where he may put the refuse of his mill, and if he does not put it where the Secretary of War tells him then he is liable to be prosecuted under this proposed law.

It is not only objectionable for the reason that this is an assumption of right and power where the Government has not any right to assume authority over the non-navigable streams of the State, but it is also objectionable in the particulars in which it is provided that filth of any kind, cinders, sawdust, slabs, anything that shall be thrown into an affluent may render the citizen who thus throws it in subject to the pains and penalties of the bill.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Missouri will yield to me just one moment, I should like to have an understanding about this five-minute rule. How many times is each Senator allowed to speak under the five-minute rule? As often as he pleases?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under what is well known as the five-minute rule, no; but under the rule adopted by the Senate by unanimous consent no limitation was placed upon the number of times a Senator might address the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I propose a limitation upon the number of times a Senator may address the Senate under the five-minute rule as applied to the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon the same question?

Mr. BUTLER. Upon the same question. I ask unanimous consent that no Senator shall be allowed to address the Chair more than once upon the same question under the five-minute rule in the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, on the same amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. On the same amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that no Senator be permitted to address the Senate more than once on the same amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I congratulate the Democratic party upon the accession to the doctrine of State rights which has been so eminently displayed here this evening. I hardly expected to be lectured by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] or the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. TELLER. I had the misfortune to be brought up in the Democratic party, and I have maintained some of the better features of Democracy myself.

Mr. VEST. I knew that while the Senator did vote the Republican ticket he had some of the habits of the Democratic party. At the same time I have noticed a good deal that was very commendable about the Senator, the origin of which I have now ascertained.

Mr. President, this whole question comes down at last to this: What is the extent of the jurisdiction and what is the duty of the Federal Government as to navigable streams? If you carry out the opposition to these sections which has been developed here to some extent to-night it amounts logically to this, that while the Government of the United States takes jurisdiction over these waters for the purpose of improving them it can not prevent obstructions from being placed in them.

The Senator from Colorado says we go into the interior of a State and take charge of streams under the jurisdiction exclusively of the State government. I assert that whenever the Congress of the United States has the right under the Constitution to improve a stream it has the right to prevent a State from putting obstructions in that stream. If that is not true, then the jurisdiction of the Federal Government amounts to nothing.

I am considered to be rather extreme upon the doctrine of State rights, but I have never gone so far as to deny to the General Government the right to protect its own property. If we have the power to pass a river and harbor bill, and this section provides here in the first part of it that it applies only to streams for which we have voted appropriations, we can not vote appropriations unless we have the constitutional power to improve; if we have the constitutional power to improve we have the constitutional power to preserve, and the thing is just as logical as logic can be made to appear.

The Senator from Colorado draws a pathetic picture of a miner away up among the clouds who can not throw any sort of débris or detritus into a mountain stream because it may wash down into navigable waters. There is a condition in the latter part of this section that it become—not "may become," but "and become" is the language of the bill—an obstruction to navigation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is that?

Mr. VEST. In line 26.

Mr. TELLER. If it may become.

Mr. VEST. No, sir; it is "and become." There is no "may" about it. I will read the language of it to put that beyond any question.

Mr. TELLER. That is what it means.

Mr. VEST. The language beginning in line 23 is as follows:

> In any place or situation on shore where the same shall be liable to be washed into any navigable waters, either by ordinary or high tides, or by storms or floods, or otherwise, and become an obstruction to navigation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That only applies to mineral lands.

Mr. VEST. That applies to the foregoing part of the whole section.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. Well, we can very soon arrange that. It is a mere matter of the construction of sentences.

Mr. HALE. It only applies to matter that has been deposited on shore. It is a special provision.

Mr. VEST. Very well; we shall have no quibble about that. I undertake to say for the committee that we shall be perfectly willing to apply that to the foregoing part of the section, and make that issue a fact whether it does become an obstruction to navigation, whether it is put into the stream or put upon the shore; and if the United States can not do that, we had better not pass this bill.

The idea that any man or any State or any corporation can go and block up a navigable stream or that it can go to an affluent of that stream when the direct result is to impede navigation! And then we are met from the other side of this Chamber with the extreme doctrine of State rights, that we are invading the sovereignty of the respective States of the Union!

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Look at lines 23 and 24 and see if it is not made an offense to put certain matter where it may be washed in, "and may become," where it is liable to be washed in and may become an obstruction to navigation.

Mr. VEST. "And become."

Mr. TELLER. Where the same shall be liable to be washed into any navigable water. It is not where it is washed in, but where it is liable to be washed in. As I said, the depositing on the bank is an offense.

Mr. VEST. If the nature of that stream is such that the deposit upon the bank may endanger navigation by a rise and freshet to which it is subject periodically, the United States Government has the right to protect it. Otherwise we should be put in the position of allowing any man to endanger navigation upon a navigable stream over which we have jurisdiction by putting deposits of any sort in such a situation that they may be carried by the water into the navigable stream for which we are responsible to the people. That is the whole of it.

If the Senators admit the proposition that the General Government has control over these streams so as to pursue navigation, then they must admit that we have the right to pass this section; and if they are sincere in seeking to make these streams navigable they will assist the committee, if the construction of these sentences be not proper, so that we can at least carry out and put into operation the legitimate powers and functions of the Government.

When we come to the next section I shall have something to say in regard to some of the provisions in that section, to which upon a closer examination I am not able to assent; but as to the second section I unhesitatingly declare that it is absolutely necessary and proper.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question before he sits down. He has had experience in dealing with river and harbor bills. Has he ever known before any river and harbor bill that attempted to assert any such jurisdiction as this in order to preserve works conducted under governmental Federal appropriations? Why does there spring up now at once this sudden desire to penetrate into the interior of a State and take charge of every small stream and oust the State jurisdiction? It is not an invocation of the extreme doctrine of State rights that the opponents of these sections are now resorting to. It is the assertion of the extreme and hitherto unattempted exercise of the right of the General Government that the committee is seeking to exercise upon Congress. The extremity of the measure is on that side and not in opposition to the sections.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, I do not remember a single session of Congress in the years I have served upon the Commerce Committee in which propositions have not been brought there for this very purpose, in order to prevent the dumping of débris and refuse matter into the harbors and rivers of the United States. They have come as separate bills, and I believe that I can find where they have been put in as provisions on the general river and harbor bill.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator could point out such a case. I have been unable to find it.

Mr. DOLPH. It was done yesterday in regard to New York Harbor.

Mr. HALE. It has been done where there was no question and where none can be raised about the jurisdiction of the General Government, but never before in my experience in either House of nearly twenty years has the attempt been made to invade the State jurisdiction over these interior waters.

Mr. DOLPH. Let me read from a bill passed by the Senate yesterday:

> That the placing, discharging, &c.—
> Of débris—
> in the tidal waters of the harbor of New York or its adjacent or tributary waters is hereby strictly forbidden, and every such act is made a misdemeanor.

There you have tributary waters which extend far up in the State of New York.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, so far as the authority of the Federal Government is concerned, it is just as much an invasion of the State sovereignty and the State power to improve a harbor as it is to improve a river. The invasion of a State sovereignty extends no further than the navigable character of the harbor or the stream.

It was contended originally, and I think very clearly, that there was nothing in the mere words "regulation of commerce" to authorize any material improvement in a harbor; but we have passed beyond that, and now so far as the sovereignty of the State is concerned it is just as much an invasion of its attributes and its power to exclude any other sovereignty to put an improvement into a harbor as it is to put it upon any river. We have gone beyond that to improving navigable rivers.

As the Senator from Missouri has said, a river upon the top of the Rocky Mountains is improved, and the question of interference with its navigation is concerned. To that extent the power of the Federal Government extends, but not beyond that, and neither in extending nor in protecting that improvement can it interfere with the rights which have been derived from the State and which are not of a character to interfere with the Federal Government. It can not interfere with private property nor with its legitimate and proper uses.

I take it that there is nothing in this distinction that the power of the State is interfered with, because the Federal Government preserves the navigation of the rivers if it has power to make any improvement. If interstate commerce bears the same relation that foreign commerce does, there is nothing in the argument, and whatever relates to the improvement of foreign commerce also relates to the improvement of interstate commerce. I can see no force in the distinctions that are now sought to be drawn and no danger to the sovereignty of the States, which certainly extends as fully and absolutely as it is possible for it to do over every subject of State sovereignty and State action—quite as fully when it is limited to non-interference with the navigation of streams, whether great or small, that are improved by the Federal Government.

Mr. HOAR. I think, Mr. President, that these sections as they now stand in the bill go very much too far, and there is great force in the argument made by the Senator from Maine against the sections as they stand. It seems to me they ought to be carefully confined to the case of a distinct, direct, substantial interference with navigation or a direct and substantial danger to navigation such as could be restrained by an indictment or by injunction in a case of a similar interference with an ordinary public way or similar interference with property owned by private individuals. The amendments which I have moved are in the line of so limiting the phraseology of the statute that if these amendments can be adopted I should concur with the committee in retaining the sections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These punitive sections, Mr. President, have no place, as we all know and agree, by our rules in an appropriation bill at all. They are sections of extreme difficulty in respect of keeping within the boundary not only of the constitutional power of Congress, but within the boundary of just legislation; and an appropriation bill is no place to consider them upon or perfect them upon; but here they are. They came from the House. I shall vote when the proper time comes, or move, if I can, to strike them all out, and then let the Congress of the United States, as I agree it ought to do, provide in a suitable bill, with suitable penal provisions and prohibitions and in a regular way, for punishing any person who willfully or knowingly does anything to obstruct the navigable waters of the United States.

I do not agree with the Senator from Florida that every stream that Congress chooses to appropriate money to do what is called improving thereby becomes navigable water of the United States within the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States to dominate the conduct of individuals in respect of that water, for, as I think I said yesterday, at any rate I will say it now, in my judgment Congress has the power, and certainly it has exercised it for a century nearly, or will have done so in two or three years, to give away the money of the United States for any object that it pleases to anybody who is willing to take it or allow it to be spent on his land. If Congress chooses to appropriate $500 to put a row of maple trees across my garden in Burlington, Vt., it has a constitutional right to do it, and I do not say nay; but after it does it, does anybody pretend that Congress has a right to interfere with my garden thereafter?

Mr. HARRIS. Under what clause of the Constitution can Congress do it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The clause which provides that Congress may appropriate money, the only limitation on that being that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except by an appropriation made by law. That is the only limit. There is the proposition. I am not going into that. This is a subject a little foreign to what I intend to speak about.

Now, what is a navigable river that Congress, under the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court constant and uniform and long-continued, has a right to regulate the condition of persons upon and about? Therefore I have no question at all that Congress has a right to say that no man shall toss a buscuit into the harbor of New York. If Congress chooses to say so foolish a thing as that, it has the power. But when Congress undertakes to say that no man shall toss a buscuit into a trout-brook on the farm on which I was born in Vermont, I declare that it has no right to do anything of the kind. There is the difference. One is a navigable water, and the other is not.

Here is about the latest and certainly the clearest—but not different from all the others—definition given by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1870 as to what is a navigable river, or navigable water, which is the same thing. Of course a river is one kind of navigable water, and a harbor and the sea is another:

> Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition—

That is as nature finds them—

> as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. And they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States, when they form in their ordinary condition by themselves—> or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

Again their ordinary and natural condition—

A river which has not been cleaned out and which is not navigable in its ordinary condition, as the court say, is not a navigable water of the United States, and the Supreme Court applied that to the Penobscot River in the State of Maine, which is navigable from the sea in its ordinary condition, as God made it, up to Bangor, I believe, and then there is a waterfall and so on for two or three or four miles, no matter what, not navigable in its ordinary condition, but capable, as my friend from Massachusetts suggests, by the appropriation of a million or two of money of carrying a ship up it. Above that is again a stretch of water that is navigable in its ordinary condition by a vessel that could fairly be called a vessel. The State of Maine gave an exclusive privilege for twenty years to a person who would improve it a little to run a steamboat on it. When he had got it into condition and had started his steamboat, an enterprising pioneer with another steamboat, registered and licensed for the coasting-trade as it was called, set forth on that reach of river, and the first man who had this grant from the State applied for an injunction and he got it. The case came up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court held that this upper part of this river, which was navigable in its ordinary condition, was not a navigable water of the United States and was not water over which Congress had any jurisdiction at all, and, therefore, that it was competent for the State of Maine, as it would not otherwise have been, to have said that no man but her grantee should run a steamboat on that water.

Very well. Therefore, Mr. President, Congress has a perfect right and it is its duty to protect the navigable waters of the United States that are such within this definition of the Supreme Court, from injuries that will impede navigation; but it ought to be done in a careful and judicious and systematic way; it ought not to be attempted in an appropriation bill of this kind. If I had the time I could go on through these sections and point out how quick the district attorney of the United States or anybody else who sues as an informer would be tripped up on these sections as they now stand, and how in other respects they go far beyond not only any possible constitutional authority of Congress to deal with it, but far beyond what is just or reasonable or necessary for the public safety at all.

I do not want to do it, then, Mr. President. As ready and as willing as I am to provide suitable and proper punishments and protection in respect of obstructing or injuring the navigable waters of the United States, I do not want to say, even as to a navigable water, as this bill now does, that no man shall throw a barrel of spoiled fish within 3 miles of the shore along the whole Atlantic seaboard—all that is navigable water of the United States, and the man who did it would come within the very letter of the law. Is that right? It is absurd, as everybody knows.

Mr. CONGER. Would it obstruct navigation?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not say "obstruct navigation."

Mr. CONGER. Yes, it does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator and I differ most decidedly about that, as the bill now stands. The Senator is entitled to his opinion and I respectfully insist upon mine. There is the difference between us. Then, when you go beyond that to the putting of anything into any stream, no matter how small, that runs into any navigable water, no matter how far distant, and say that a man who does it is guilty if it is liable to obstruct navigation; the man that throws a shovelful of sand into the Yellowstone River has contributed his mite to the silt that deposits itself at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I obey.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, if Senators here were half as well acquainted with one line of the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation," as they are ready to cite some lesson in the Constitution of the United States, they could find more in this bill to object to than has been cited in the discussion which has been had to-day.

I object to the bill as a whole. I object to it because I consider it a trade and compromise measure, and all that is said here about State sovereignty and about the constitutional right of Congress to appropriate money for purposes of this sort just fall to the ground when you consider that in this bill you have an appropriation of thousands of dollars of money for rivers and harbors, and one-half of your appropriation goes to that which you would not dare call a river if you went to your home, and it is a place, in many cases, where you could hardly catch a trout in the summer time. I know it right here by reading this bill. I see here appropriations for a pond.

I know that it is said that the Hennepin Canal has been petitioned for by what we call the Knights of Labor, and that we ought to pass that by all means because these men do petition for it. Have you a suggestion to make in the Senate that when they ask you to give them labor on a canal they also petition you in the same breath to tax them out of the little profit that inures to them from their labor?

That is your bill. Discuss this bill as a whole. Leave out the whole theory and everything that has been suggested here respecting the theory of State sovereignty. State rights is one thing and State sovereignty another. State sovereignty is one of the things that have gone by. State rights and State sovereignty are as contradistinct as two terms can be. When we say State rights now we mean the right of a man in his State. The two terms never were used as they have been used here in this debate.

Now, I will take a creek, I will make myself the victim of an illustration and carry it back to my own people, for I believe they are honest and I believe they do not want me to vote for a bill that would appropriate money under a pretense that is false. I will take Wilson's Creek for which you propose to appropriate $10,000. What is your $10,000 going to amount to? Can you improve it with $10,000 from the mountain down to the sea, a mountain that itself is 6,000 feet above the sea? Do you tell me you can improve it with $10,000? What Senator on this floor can get up and say that he thinks it can be done?

There are just such appropriations in this bill. Is there a Senator who will say they amount to anything? Is there a Senator who does not take some kind of sweet consolation to himself that he has something in the bill?

Mr. MCMILLAN. To what line does the Senator refer?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I shall have to look at the bill again. I see on the map Wilson's Creek. I do not want to strike it out; I am only illustrating; because I know that we pay seven millions of internal-revenue tax, which I want to repeal, and you refuse to allow me, in the interest of my constituents, to have it repealed. If you are going to take the money for rivers and harbors, I am going to tell the truth about it.

Norfolk Harbor ought to be improved. New York Harbor perhaps ought to be improved; I do not know enough about it to say. The harbor at Newport News ought to be improved. And it ought to be the business of Senators here to consider when they bring in a river and harbor bill that they bring it in for no other purpose than to improve harbors and to regulate and increase our commerce and to improve our commercial interests.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not find any appropriation in the bill for Wilson's Creek.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that he is possibly mistaken, because when I thought I might make a mistake, which I have been so much in the habit of doing in the estimation of the chairmen of committees here, I looked over it and read it myself.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will permit me to call his attention to an item here. Perhaps this is what he refers to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am not objecting, because this is only one of many items there are in the bill. If you leave that in, tell me the reason you put it in.

Mr. MCMILLAN. On what page is that?

Mr. ALLISON. On page 26.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not know why the Senator at the head of the Committee on Commerce should want to break me up so suddenly in this manner and deny a fact that I know is in the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The item referred to, I think, is:

Improving New River, Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; that is a stream that separates Wythe County from an adjoining one, and empties into another stream in North Carolina.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then if the Senator will permit me to read the appropriation as I find it here——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that his time has expired.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I suppose so, but I think it ought to be charged to the Senator from Minnesota. I think I ought to be allowed to go on further, especially inasmuch as I had to object to the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina. I knew that all that could be said in favor of this bill had been said without limitation, and I did think I would be allowed at least to make two talks of five minutes each in opposition.

I was going on to refer to some other items here, but I wanted to commence with my own State first, and then I wanted to go to the State of the Senator from Minnesota, and I was going then to the State of Michigan; but I will wait until some intervening motion when I shall be entitled to another five minutes.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. I wish to offer an amendment to reach the question of grammatical construction. The committee certainly intended that the provision in line 26 of this section should apply to the whole provision, but in order to remove any doubt about that I give notice that I will move, before a vote is taken on striking out the section, to insert in line 10 of section 2, after the word "rivers," the words "so as to obstruct navigation." That makes that provision apply to rivers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10, section 2, after the word "rivers," it is proposed to insert "so as to obstruct navigation."

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire what is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment pending is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the proposition before the Senate was the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to strike out section 2. Is not that the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not the immediate question.

Mr. HALE. That motion will be made later.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is in line 9, section 2.

Mr. HALE. Let that be read.

Mr. CALL. Before the vote is taken I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], in reply to what he has said, to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wisconsin vs. Duluth, 6 Otto, rendered at the October term, 1877, in which the court say:

And in the act of August 1, 1876, there is the following paragraph:

"For the improvement of the harbor at Duluth, Minn., $15,000. Said appropriation is made upon the express condition that it shall be without prejudice to either party in the suit now pending between the State of Wisconsin, plaintiff, and the city of Duluth and the Northern Pacific Railroad, defendants.

* * * * * * *

The Congress of the United States had themselves before this adopted, recognized, and taken charge of this work. It had placed it on precisely the same ground, and provided for it in the same paragraph, and out of the same aggregate sum of money, that it did the work at the original entrance, as it is aptly called, at the mouth of the river. It had abandoned the breakwater as a failure, and as unnecessary, in consequence of this new and more useful improvement. The War Department had accepted the charge of the work, had expended the appropriations made, and had now for several years made the same regular estimates for this work that it did for all others under its control and management. And though the State of Wisconsin had brought her suit in this court to abate the work as a nuisance, and Congress was made aware of the fact, it still, in 1876, made the usual appropriation, and the War Department still had the work in charge; and the Congress cautiously said, this shall prejudice no one in the suit, but we shall go on notwithstanding, and continue this system of improvement.

We do not feel called upon to make an argument to prove that these statutes of the Congress of the United States, and these acts of the executive department in carrying those statutes into effect, constitute an adoption of the canal and harbor improvement started by the city of Duluth, and a taking exclusive charge and control of it. That they amount to the declaration of the Federal Government, that we here interpose and assert our power. We take upon ourselves the burden of this improvement, which properly belongs to us, and that hereafter this work for the public good is in our hands and subject to our control.

* * * * * * *

Nor can there be any doubt that such action is within the constitutional power of Congress. It is a power which has been exercised ever since the Government was organized under the Constitution. The only question ever raised has been how far and under what circumstances the exercise of the power is exclusive of its exercise by the States. And while this court has maintained in many cases the right of the States to authorize structures in and over the navigable waters of the States, which may either impede or improve their navigation, in the absence of any action of the General Government in the same matter, the doctrine has been laid down with unvarying uniformity that when Congress has by any expression of its will occupied the field, that action was conclusive of any right to the contrary asserted under State authority. The adjudged cases in this court on this point are numerous.

I cite that in reply to the decision cited by the Senator from Vermont, that it must be a stream navigable in the ordinary course of nature. This was a canal and the work was accepted by Congress and an appropriation made for it, and the Supreme Court decided that that act of Congress was an adoption of the canal and constituted an exclusive right to use it for navigable purposes and protection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I avail myself of this opportunity to reply to the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator who has spoken on the text of the proposition before the Senate. I am availing myself of the opportunity to enter my objection to the whole bill. I started at home. It seems to be a favorite kind of fun with some members of the committee to refer back to pages 26 and 28, and along there, and I hope that I may be allowed to invite their attention to pages 69 and 70, and I should like some member of the Committee on Commerce to tell me where San Pedro Bay is. I find on page 69 this provision:

San Pedro Bay near the entrance to Wilmington Harbor, with a view to establishing an outer harbor for the protection of deep-draught vessels.

Where is it? Without looking at the bill, I undertake to say that there are not more than two members of the Senate who could tell me it is in California; and I say that with all deference.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will observe that is only in a section providing for surveys.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I mean to watch every minute and take it off the time of the Senator from Minnesota, for he has spoken for hours on this bill.

Where is "Five-Mile River Harbor?" Will some gentleman tell me? Will some Senator from Connecticut tell me whether that is in his State? This bill tells me it is there. I could find plenty of five-mile harbors in my country.

Can anybody tell me where the next item of appropriation for the "James River" is to go? Somebody will suppose, I reckon, that it is to go to Virginia; but no, they have named a child after that river in Dakota.

Where is "Duck Creek?" Will any member of the committee condescend to tell me where Duck Creek is that we are asked to vote money to improve? I observe you have put it in italics. I think you meant to draw attention to it and possibly to say that it was an amendment you ought not to have made. That, I notice from the bill, is in Delaware. Can you tell me where?

How shall I pronounce the next item—"Punta Rassa Harbor?" It reminds me of one of those Colorado newspaper headlines, with their peculiar spelling. There is not a member of the committee who can tell me where it is and they ask us to vote away money for it. I question very much whether even the Senator from Florida knows that it is in his own State.

Then here is another item:

Resurvey of Tampa Bay, including Hillsborough River up to the city of Tampa.

There is a Hillsborough on the Loudoun and Hampshire Railroad, and there is a Cedar Run close by.

At the end of this bill they say it is only for the purpose of having surveys, and then they use the term "resurvey;" for instance, I find:

Resurvey of outer and inner bars at Pensacola.
Charlotte Harbor, including San Carlos Bay.

Will the Senator who heads the committee tell me where that is? I do not mean to reflect upon him when I ask him that question, for I assure him that I do not know. Here is:

Clear Water Harbor, including Anclote and Saint Joseph's Bays and the Narrows into Boga Ciega Bay.

I suppose that is where they keep the Apollinaris water on ice. Nobody can tell anything about it, and yet the Senator thinks we ought to vote for these appropriations.

Here is the "Savannah River." We all know what the Savannah River is and where it is. It is put here in this way:

Savannah River from cross-tides above Savannah to the bar, with a view to obtaining 28 feet of water in the channel.

For sixteen years I think I understood something of that, where the people of a little neighborhood in the State from which I came built a bridge so low that a boat could not go under it, and then they were always asking for an appropriation to do something in the way of improving that stream. Below the bridge it was navigable for considerable freight vessels. The ordinary steamers that go down the river here, like the Arrowsmith, could go to that bridge but they could not go a yard beyond it.

Flint River from Montezuma to Old Agency.

Where is that? In what State? It sounds to me as if it was in Mexico, for in times past I have read something of the Halls of the Montezumas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has again expired.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will watch another opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], without objection, is agreed to, and the amendment of the committee disagreed to. The next amendment will be stated on page 62.

Mr. HALE. Is that an amendment to the same section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HALE. I wish to move, before reaching that, in line 16 of section 2, to strike out all after the word "appropriations," down to and including the word "navigation," in line 26.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The Chair is reminded by the Chief Clerk that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has an amendment pending.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir, in line 17, after the word "rivers," to insert:

So as to obstruct navigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Perhaps the Senator from Maine had better permit his amendment to remain until we get through the committee's amendments.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. As the Senator who offered the amendment does not have anything to say, I want to object to it for a temporary purpose.

Mr. HALE. Let us go on with the committee amendments to the end of the section. That is strictly in order, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee on page 62 will be reported.

Mr. HALE. These other amendments will come later.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 2, line 39, after the word "improvements," to insert:

Nor be so constructed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining, by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure: And provided further, That in places where harbor-lines have not been established, and where such deposits can be made without injury to navigation, within lines to be established by the Secretary of War, said officer may, and is hereby authorized to, cause such lines to be established; and within such lines such deposits may be made, under regulations to be from time to time prescribed by him.

So as to read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to the casting out, unlading, or throwing out of any ship or vessel, lighter, barge, boat, or other craft, any stones, rocks, bricks, lime, or other materials used, or to be used, in or toward the building, repairing, or keeping in repair any quay, pier, wharf, weir, bridge, building, or other work lawfully erected or to be erected on the banks or sides of any port, harbor, haven, channel, or navigable river, or to the casting out, unlading, or depositing of any material excavated for the improvement of navigable waters, into such places and in such manner as may be deemed by the United States officer supervising said improvement most judicious and practicable and for the best interests of such improvements; nor be so construed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining, by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure: And provided further, That in places where harbor-lines have not been established, and where such deposits can be made without injury to navigation, within lines to be established by the Secretary of War, said officer may, and is hereby authorized to, cause such lines to be established; and within such lines such deposits may be made, under regulations to be from time to time prescribed by him.

Mr. INGALLS. If that amendment is now agreed to will it be subsequently open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment itself in Committee of the Whole would not.

Mr. INGALLS. I mention this because the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] desired to offer an amendment like the previous amendment in regard to mining deposits. I do not wish to interfere with the regular order about considering committee amendments before others are moved; but if the Senator would lose his opportunity to amend by allowing this to go now without consideration he ought to have a chance to offer it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposes it can be amended in the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Would it be a violation of the agreement to have that amendment offered now?

Mr. HALE. It must be offered now; it is an amendment to an amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order now.

Mr. INGALLS. I was uncertain whether it was or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] will be considered as offered to the committee's amendment. It will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 42, in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, after the word "pressure," it is proposed to insert "and against mountain sides or natural banks;" so as to read:

Nor be so construed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining, by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure and against mountain sides or natural banks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be considered agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object, and I want to speak to that. I have heard several times the words used "agreed to." I do not know how Senators make agreements. I am sure I have not been a party to any agreement. I do not know what the word means. I have no agreement except to do what I think is right. If I make a mistake, then I will say I have made it.

I will quote in opposition to this motion from page 70, under the head of "Illinois:"

Farm Creek, with a view to changing its course.

Where is Farm Creek, and why is it that Congress proposes to improve Farm Creek. Tell us something, or else do not ask us to appropriate money to improve it. I see below it:

Kaskaskia River from New Athens to mouth.

They do not even employ the definite article to tell us whether it is the mouth of the same river or not; they leave out the word "the" and ask us to appropriate for it.

Bars in Hamburg Bay.

Where is Hamburg and where is the bay? Are we to sit here and vote away millions of money on a bill that none of us would want to carry before our own people and undertake to maintain ourselves on? Here is:

Mississippi River at Rush Island Bend and Ivy Landing, with a view to confining and deepening the channel.

I do not like to go into history, but I think I have faculty enough to tell it. There is a little place which we call Stony Creek that is larger than that stream, and I have crossed the river with cavalry boots on to get away from men who were trying to catch me and I succeeded. It is called Harrison's Landing. Why not appropriate money for that?

Take this over and look at it, and I believe the Senator who is at the head of this committee denied a while ago—no, he did not deny, but rather suggested that I was mistaken. Here is under the head of "Kentucky"—

Pond River.

Will one of the Senators from that State tell me where it is and what the size of it is? Your Fish Commission will not let a man have carp until he certifies that the area of his pond is so much, and then a Senator or member of the House must certify to it.

Licking River from Farmer's to West Liberty.

Where is it? Who ever heard of it? It would take a ten-horse power magnifying pair of spectacles to find it on any map.

For ice-harbor at Paducah, Ky.

They do not even give "ice" the benefit of a capital I or "harbor"

the benefit of a capital H. Is it the fault of the committee in not knowing how to use their capitals, or is this matter of so little importance that they do not want to call our attention to it? They have a capital next, for they have—

The bar at the mouth of Limestone Creek, in the harbor of Maysville.

Then they have got in Louisiana—

Little River.

Why say "Little?" Why is it called "Little River?" Why should we make an appropriation for it without knowing about it, or sending men there to survey it? Then they have got—

Bayou Rouge.

They have got—

Dugdemona River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to go through with this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move now to strike out section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that under the order, unless a different rule has been adopted, that would not be in order until the other amendments of the committee are disposed of.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly when we come to sections which are specific in their nature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendments of the committee must be first acted upon. The bill is not voted upon by sections. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair rule that the entire contents of the bill must be gone through before any amendments are offered to the section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee are first to be acted on.

Mr. HALE. Before any amendments are offered to the different sections?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce is, to strike out all of line 10 and down to and including all of line 15, as follows:

Recoverable, by and in the name of the United States of America, with costs, in any circuit or district court of the United States, at the suit of any district attorney of the United States, or at the suit of any person, by information to any district attorney in any district where, or near to where, the offense shall have been committed or the offender shall be.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Recovered by action in the name of the United States in any district court within whose jurisdiction such offense shall be committed, said action to be instituted by the district attorney for such district, at the instance of any person complaining.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want to avail myself of a further opportunity to call attention to some other items in subsequent pages.

For a survey of the Ohio River near the city of Evansville, Ind., with a view—

The Ohio River has a large margin of appropriation—with a view to determining what, if anything, will be necessary to prevent a change of the channel of the river in front of that city.

Now, I come over to Maine. I shall be pardoned if I am unable to pronounce anything here properly, because I have often been told that the best English was that which was spoken by the best educated people. Here is a word spelled "Bayoduce"—

Bayoduce River, between the towns of Penobscot and Brooksville.

It never was in any appropriation bill before that I have heard of, and I do not know that if we would give them any amount of money it could be made a navigable stream. Then here we have—

Big Rapids of Saint John's River.

Then we have—

Camden Harbor.

Then we have—

Rockport Harbor.

Then we have the Kennebec River, which I believe some of the schoolboys learn to sing the name when the English language was taught by us by associating the rivers with the capitals of the States.

Saint George's River from Warren to Thomaston.
Matinicus Isle, with a view to a harbor of refuge.

I think they might move down here in the Senate Chamber and have a harbor of refuge here.

Penobscot River from Bangor to Bucksport Narrows.
Saint Croix River from Ferry Point Bridge, at Calais, to Breakwater Ledge.
Bar Harbor—

I recollect having heard of that—

Bar Harbor, Maine, with a view of establishing a breakwater and deepening the waters of said harbor, and especially the channel between Rodick's Island and Mount Desert Island.

Maryland:
Cambridge Harbor.

I could walk around Maryland in two days, and came very near doing it once, but I never heard of Cambridge Harbor there. I do not think it will agree with Maryland to have these things done. There is one stream of Maryland that we cross when we go into Delaware, and I forget the name of it now. Then here is the Patuxent River from Benedict to Hill's Landing.

And—

For widening the channel of Baltimore Harbor to 600 feet.

In italics again. Can the Baltimore Harbor be made 600 feet? You will have to take 600 feet off Baltimore, for, if my recollection serves me aright, when you get out of that harbor the first thing you run yourself against is a brick house.

Now we have "Massachusetts."

Duxbury Harbor.
Wellfleet Harbor.
Falmouth Harbor of Refuge.
Vineyard Haven Harbor.
Cottage City Harbor.
Menemsha Harbor of Refuge.
Taunton River.
Winthrop Harbor.
New Bedford Harbor.

And we go on until we come to Saint Clair, and we come down in the bill until we meet the suggestion that we ought to pass these appropriations for surveys and resurveys because the names of some of them are Saint John's and Saint Paul and Saint Peter.

Mr. President, I will not consume longer time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

Mr. KENNA. I was not in the Chamber at the moment when the Senate passed section 3. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to strike out after the word "water," in line 24, section 3, the words "not wholly within the limits of such State," and insert in lieu thereof the words "of the United States," a mere formal amendment to make the meaning plainer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, in section 7, line 5, before the words "of customs," to strike out "collector" and insert "collectors;" in line 7, after "United States," to strike out "nearest to the place where" and insert "for the district in which;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. It shall be the duty of officers and agents having the supervision, on the part of the United States, of the works in progress for the preservation and improvement of said navigable waters, and in their absence of the United States collectors of customs and other revenue officers, to enforce the provisions of this law by giving information to the district attorney of the United States for the district in which any violation of any provision of this act shall have been committed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 8, in the following words:

SEC. 8. Officers having charge of works for the improvement of rivers and harbors, with the approval of the Secretary of War, may cause proceedings to be instituted, in the name of the United States, in any court having jurisdiction of such proceedings, for the acquirement by condemnation of any land or material needed to enable them to prosecute such works; such proceedings to be prosecuted in accordance with the laws relating to suits for the condemnation of property of the States wherein the proceedings may be instituted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, line 11, before the word "proper" to strike out "it," and after "proper" to strike out "to lay before Congress;" so as to read:

SEC. 9. The Secretary of War shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to secure a judicious and economical expenditure of the money herein appropriated, and shall cause to be made and submitted to Congress annual reports, together with maps and plans, including the report of the Mississippi River Commission, on or before December 1, giving detailed statements of the work done, contracts made, the expenditures thereunder or otherwise, and balances of money on hand up to November 1, and the effect of such works, together with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, line 11, after the word "shall," to strike out "also;" in line 12, after the word "Congress," to strike out "at its next session;" after the word "all," at the end of the same line, to strike out "the instances in the United States" and insert "cases;" in line 18, after the word "injury," to strike out "and the facts touching the same, which reports shall be accompanied by the affidavit or affidavits of the person or persons charged with obtaining the foregoing information;" in line 21, after the word "shall," to strike out "also;" and in the same line, after the word "report," to strike out "annually;" so as to read:

He shall, at the same time, report to Congress all cases in which piers, breakwaters, locks, and dams, or other structures or works built or made by the United States in aid of commerce or navigation are used, occupied, or injured by a corporation or an individual, and the extent and mode of such use, occupation, or injury. He shall report at the same time whether any bridges, causeways, or structures now erected or in process of erection do or will interfere with free and safe navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, line 1, after the word "shall," to strike out "have good reason to believe" and insert "be satisfied;" in line 9, before the word "duty," to strike out "the" and insert "his;" after "duty," to strike out "of the said Secretary, on the presentation to him of a complaint, under oath, by any citizen of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, to cause said bridge to be forthwith removed" and insert "to cause the proper proceedings to be instituted in the circuit court of the United States within whose jurisdiction said bridge or any portion thereof may be located, to have the same condemned and removed as a public nuisance, at the expense of the person or corporation owning or maintaining said bridge;" in line 19, before the word "satisfaction," to strike out "the" and insert "his;" and after "satisfaction," to strike out "of the Secretary of War;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. Whenever the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that any railroad or other bridge now constructed or hereafter to be constructed over any of the navigable waters of the United States under authority of the United States or of any State or Territory, is an obstruction to the free navigation of such waters, by reason of insufficient height, width of span, or otherwise, or of difficulty in passing the draw-opening or the raft-span of said bridge by rafts, steamboats, or other water craft, it shall be his duty to cause the proper proceedings to be instituted in the circuit court of the United States within whose jurisdiction said bridge or any portion thereof may be located, to have the same condemned and removed as a public nuisance, at the expense of the person or corporation owning or maintaining said bridge, unless the owners or managers thereof shall cause the same to be altered to his satisfaction within a reasonable time prescribed by him, so that it shall not be an obstruction to navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. The amendments offered by the committee are undoubtedly an improvement of the section, but I wish now to call attention to the section itself as a very extraordinary one and one which seems to me entirely intolerable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment to that section would not now be in order.

Mr. EVARTS. Whenever it shall be in time——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in time after the amendments of the committee are disposed of.

Mr. EVARTS. I shall propose to amend by adding:

Provided, however, That this section shall not embrace or affect the bridge across the East River between New York and Brooklyn, or any bridge constructed in accordance with previous authority of the laws of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not now in order.

Mr. EVARTS. I shall also move to strike out the whole section.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the remaining committee amendments to the bill, which are all amendments inserting the names of places for surveys, which are always put in as a matter of course, may be treated as one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that course will be pursued, and all the amendments to section 12 will be treated as one amendment.

The amendments in section 12, providing for examinations or surveys, or both, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, under the head of "Arkansas," after line 11, to insert:

Cache River.

Under the head of "Connecticut," after line 21, to insert:

Resurvey of Duck Island Harbor, on Long Island Sound, including plans, specifications, and estimate of cost for making the same a harbor of refuge.

After line 26, to insert:

Delaware:
Duck Creek.

After line 54, to insert:

Indiana:
For a survey of the Ohio River near the city of Evansville, Ind., with a view to determine what, if anything, will be necessary to prevent a change of the channel of the river in front of that city.

Under the head of "Louisiana," after line 95, to insert:

Bayou Rondeway.
Cypress Bayou.
Bayou Vidal.

Under the head of "Maine," after line 111, to insert:

Bar Harbor, Maine, with the view of establishing a breakwater and deepening the waters of said harbor, and especially the channel between Rodick's Island and Mount Desert Island.

Under the head of "Maryland," after line 119, to insert:

For widening the channel of Baltimore Harbor to 600 feet.

Under the head of "Michigan," after line 137, to insert:

Harbor at Forestville, Lake Huron.

Under the head of "Michigan," after line 149, to insert:

Torch Lake Channel, Lake Superior.

Under the head of "Minnesota," at the end of line 153, after the word "Lake" to strike out "Falls;" so as to read:

Red Lake River from Grand Forks to Red Lake.

After line 174, insert:

New Hampshire:
Bellamy River.

After line 176, insert:

North Carolina:
Alligator River.
Lockwood's Folly River.
Lumber River.
Yadkin River from South Carolina line to the Narrows.
Catawba River.

Under the head of "Texas," strike out lines 235 to 237, inclusive, as follows:

Raft at the mouth of Guadaloupe River.
Sabine River from Logan's Port down to its mouth.
Colorado and Brazos.

Under the head of "Virginia," after line 243, insert:

Hunter's Creek.

Under the head of "West Virginia," after line 245, insert:

Meadow River.

Under the head of "Wisconsin," after line 249, insert:

Harbor at Hudson, Lake Saint Croix.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to insert, in the State of Massachusetts, in the survey section, before line 123, "Manchester Harbor." I was out of the city when the committee were engaged on that portion of the bill. I was requested by the Representative of that district to call their attention to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have one or two amendments to offer from the committee before the bill is open to amendment generally. In line 165, page 8, I move to strike out "channel" and insert "ice harbor;" so as to read:

Improving ice harbor at Marcus Hook.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 978, on page 41, I move to strike out the words "the works."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. After line 25 I move to insert:

For a breakwater at Gordon Landing, on Lake Champlain, to be built on the 12-foot curve mentioned in the papers accompanying the report of the Secretary of War to the Senate, dated March 1, 1886 (Executive Document No. 81, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 25, on page 2, insert:

For a breakwater at Gordon Landing, on Lake Champlain, to be built on the 12-foot curve mentioned in the papers accompanying the report of the Secretary of War to the Senate, dated March 1, 1886, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Those are all the amendments of the committee.

Mr. FRYE. I was instructed by the committee to offer an amendment on page 12, line 282, to insert before the word "five" the word "twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Fairport, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I propose to move as the bill is considered as a whole to strike out sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 11. Section 8 has already been stricken out.

As I do not know what will be the fate of that general motion, and as it would be in order first to perfect each section, I move first, in section 2, page 61, to strike out all that portion of the section after the word "appropriations," in line 16, to and including the word "navigation," in line 26, on page 62. If the Secretary will read the words——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me a moment? I would like to suggest to the Senator from Maine and to the Senate whether it might not be well to have unanimous consent that, if the motion to strike out be rejected, it shall be in order thereafter, to save the Senate spending half an hour in amending a section and then striking it all out, by which we should have lost that time, and a majority of the Senate I think, from the vote already taken, are in favor of striking out the whole thing. We should save time by voting on that motion first.

Mr. HALE. By unanimous consent, because it will save time, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggested, I should like to take the vote on my motion to strike out section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the rule be suspended——

Mr. VEST. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow the friends of the bill, in line 17 of section 2, after the word "rivers," to insert the words "so as to obstruct navigation."

I want to remove any doubt as to the criminal construction of that section. Then he can strike it all out if that is the sense of the Senate. I want to remove any doubt as to the construction of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will repeat his amendment.

Mr. VEST. After the word "rivers," in line 17 of section 2, to insert "so as to obstruct navigation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 17, after the word "rivers," insert the words:

So as to obstruct navigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now, if the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts can be consented to unanimously, I will move to strike out all of these sections, with the understanding that if that motion fails the Senate then, as in Committee of the Whole, may proceed to perfect the sections. If the motion carries, it will of course save much time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make an amendment. I move to amend that motion by excepting from its provisions in section 2, beginning in line 42, page 62, the words:

That in places where harbor lines have not been established, and where such deposits can be made without injury to navigation, within lines to be established by the Secretary of War, said officer may, and is hereby authorized to, cause such lines to be established; and within such lines such deposits may be made, under regulations to be from time to time prescribed by him.

I desire to preserve that clause in the bill. Along the coast and in shallow channels or rivers where there is no authority to establish harbor lines it has been thought heretofore, and the committee think now, that the Secretary of War should be authorized, where there is any occasion for it, to establish harbor lines.

Mr. HALE. If the motion which I make to strike out the sections with the understanding I state carries, the Senator can then move to insert that as being only a portion of what had been stricken out.

Mr. CONGER. If the right to move it remains, I will not make the motion now.

Mr. HALE. Then, with that understanding, I move to strike out the sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the understanding asked for.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to make a single observation in reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and that is that with one or two modifications, which would be verbal, I should be willing to vote for section 2 as it now stands—with the omission of that portion between the word "appropriations," in line 16, and the word "navigation," in line 26. It would then be confined absolutely to the obstruction of navigable waters, and I know of no reason why that provision should not be incorporated. Of course there is this to be said, that it is out of place to a certain extent in this bill; but being confined exclusively to navigable waters, with such verbal alterations as might be made making the offense to be willful and knowing, I do not know why that section might not be retained. While I am entirely willing to vote to strike them all out, I think it would be better, in view of the final fate of the bill, leaving as little as possible to the fate of a conference committee, for us to retain what we properly can; and I submit to the Senator from Maine whether section 2 with those modifications might not be retained.

Mr. HALE. I should not vote for the section although it may be greatly improved by the amendment which has been referred to by the Senator from Kansas, and which I had already proposed to move. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, because it abbreviates the time which will be taken up if the motion carries pretty largely, as I hope it may. It will settle all questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair heard no objection to the suggestion.

Mr. HALE. Then I move, in order to test the sense of the Senate, to strike out section 2, section 3——

Mr. CONGER. Each section separately.

Mr. HARRISON. No; they all go together.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 11.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I submit to the Senator from Maine that section 3 covers an entirely different subject.

Mr. HALE. It is a very bad section, and I shall vote against it more quickly than the others.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. At the same time some Senators may wish to preserve that section and vote against the others, or to preserve others and vote against that. Section 3 relates to bridges.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand by agreement any Senator has a right to make a motion to restore anything that is stricken out. Why not take a vote on the two sections at once?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Any Senator can call for a separate vote on any section.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the quicker way would be to take the question section by section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator demand a division of the question?

Mr. CULLOM. I think it would be better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will first be on striking out section 2.

Mr. HALE. If that is so I will take the sense of the Senate on that. I move to strike out section 2.

The section as amended was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. It shall not be lawful to cast, throw, empty, or unlade, or cause, suffer, or procure to be cast, thrown, emptied, or unladen, either from or out of any ship, vessel, lighter, barge, boat, or other craft, or from the shore, pier, wharf, or mills of any kind whatever, any ballast, stone, slate, gravel, earth, slack, rubbish, wreck, filth, slabs, edgings, sawdust, slag, or cinders, or other refuse or mill-waste of any kind, into any port, road, roadstead, harbor, haven, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, to the substantial injury of navigation, for the improvement of which Congress has already made, or may hereafter make, appropriations, or to such injury to dump, discharge, or wash, or cause to be dumped, discharged, or washed, from any mine or mineral land or bank, tailings, bowlders, gravel, clay, earth, or débris into any navigable waters or rivers for the improvement of which Congress has made or may make appropriations, or into any tributaries, branch, or affluent of such waters or rivers, so as to obstruct navigation, or to deposit or place, wash, dump, or discharge, or cause, suffer, or procure to be deposited or placed, or washed, dumped, or discharged, any ballast, stone, slate, gravel, earth, slack, rubbish, wreck, filth, slabs, edgings, sawdust, slag, cinders, or other refuse or mill-waste, or gravel, tailings, bowlders, clay, earth, or débris, from mines or mineral lands, in any place or situation on shore where the same shall be liable to be washed into any navigable waters, either by ordinary or high tides, or by storms or floods, or otherwise, and become an obstruction to navigation: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to the casting out, unlading, or throwing out of any ship or vessel, lighter, barge, boat, or other craft, any stones, rocks, bricks, lime, or other materials used, or to be used, in or toward the building, repairing, or keeping in repair any quay, pier wharf, weir, bridge, building, or other work lawfully erected or to be erected on the banks or sides of any port, harbor, haven, channel, or navigable river, or to the casting out, unlading, or depositing of any material excavated for the improvement of navigable waters, into such places and in such manner as may be deemed by the United States officer supervising said improvement most judicious and practicable and for the best interests of such improvements, nor be so construed as to apply to any character of mining other than hydraulic mining, by water through pipes and used through nozzles under pressure: And provided further, That in places where harbor-lines have not been established, and where such deposits of débris of mines or stamp works can be made without injury to navigation, within lines to be established by the Secretary of War, said officer may, and is hereby authorized to, cause such lines to be established; and within such lines such deposits may be made, under regulations to be from time to time prescribed by him.

Mr. DOLPH. I have said nothing during this long discussion, although I presented this matter briefly this morning, and I desire now to occupy my five minutes, or a portion of them.

I read authorities this morning to show that Congress has power to prevent obstructions and authorize obstructions in navigable streams. If Congress shall undertake by this bill to do anything that it has not the constitutional power to do, the courts will hold the law a nullity to that extent. Congress can not punish a citizen for obstructing a stream that is not navigable, or for depositing anything in a stream not navigable unless it should be carried by the forces of nature into a stream that is navigable; and such is not the intention of section 2 of the bill.

The House by inserting in the section certain words and clauses to cover mining operations in California disconnected the subject-matter, disconnected the several provisions of the section a little, but nevertheless the meaning of the section as it stands is that no person shall be permitted to cast into a navigable stream within the United States, and for the improvement of which Congress makes appropriations, anything that will obstruct the navigation.

That is a proper and necessary provision, and had the scrutiny of some of the best lawyers in the Senate—the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], who is a member of that committee; the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is a member of that committee; the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], who is a member of the committee, and of the other members of the committee. It is now in such a shape that it can be enacted into a law, and if it shall be found after trial that it is not a proper one it can be easily amended hereafter. I hold in my hand the last river and harbor act. There are five or six sections in it which are general legislation. There never has been a bill of this kind that has not contained general legislation. One of the sections of this bill, section 9, which the Senator from Maine first moved to strike out, is substantially enacted in the river and harbor bill as passed two years ago.

I hope we shall not strike out this necessary legislation simply to get rid of it at this late hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out section 2.

Mr. DOLPH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when the name of Mr. ALDRICH was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I am at a loss to know how he would vote on this question, and therefore I withhold my vote. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 14; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next question is on striking out section 3.

Mr. CONGER. I offer to amend this section before it is voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Maine is not yet exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. No; but I withdrew my amendment because it was said that if the section was not stricken out the amendment would not be needed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move any portion of the matter as an independent section hereafter.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can do that after my motion is exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. I did make that motion when it was in order and withdrew it waiting for the action of the Senate to see whether they would strike out the section or not.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan to delay his motion until we get through with the vote on the other sections and then go back.

Mr. HALE. The other sections do not touch that.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to reinsert the last clause of the section just stricken out. Hereafter I will make my motions when I have the right to do so, and not withdraw them. It was said that as soon as the motion of the Senator from Maine was disposed of mine would be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Maine is not yet exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. I objected to taking these questions separately or taking them all in one motion for the very purpose of putting this matter in. Now, I do not know any species of parliamentary tactics that I am not able to provide for and meet if I can have good faith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan will be entirely in order in moving his amendment as soon as the amendment of the Senator from Maine is exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. I withheld my amendment until the vote was taken on the section, and it has been taken.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Senator from Maine made one motion, to wit, to strike out four or five sections. Then it was agreed that when the sense of the Senate had been taken on that motion the Senator from Michigan should make his motion to reinsert a part of the matter stricken out, but the single motion of the Senator from Maine has not yet had the question taken on it. Under the parliamentary law a division was called for. That, therefore, is divided into four or five parts, but it none the less is one motion, and therefore everybody is in perfect good faith in keeping the arrangement with the Senator from Michigan, because as soon as the motion of the Senator from Maine is over, which is now in process of being voted on, the Senator from Michigan will be in order in moving to reinsert.

Mr. CONGER. In justice to myself I must say that my motion was to except out of the vote these words that I propose to insert, to except them out of the operation of striking out the section. That was the proper motion then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Michigan has an undoubted right to offer his amendment as soon as the amendment of the Senator from Maine is acted on.

Mr. CONGER. I withdrew the motion to except this clause out of the operation of the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. My amendment is not through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the third section of the bill, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. It shall not be lawful to build any wharf, dolphin, boom, dam, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or other structure outside of established harbor-lines, without the permission of the Secretary of war, in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, or in such manner as to obstruct or impair navigation, commerce, or anchorage of said waters; and it shall not be lawful hereafter to commence the construction of any bridge, bridge-draw, bridge piers or abutments, causeway, or other works over or in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, under any act of the legislative assembly of any State, until the location and plan of such bridge have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War, or to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify, the course, location, condition, or capacity of the channel of said navigable waters of the United States, unless approved and authorized by the Secretary of War: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any bridge, bridge-draw, bridge piers or abutments the construction of which has been heretofore duly authorized by law, or be so construed as to authorize the construction of any bridge, draw-bridge, bridge piers or abutments, or other works, under an act of the Legislature of any State, over or in any stream, port, roadstead, haven, or harbor, or other navigable water not wholly within the limits of such State.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out section 4.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 4. All wrecks of vessels, and other obstructions to the navigation of any port, roadstead, harbor, or navigable river, or other navigable waters of the United States, which may have been permitted by the owners thereof, or the parties by whom they were caused, to remain, to the injury of commerce and navigation, for a longer period than two months, shall be subject to be broken up and removed by the Secretary of War, without liability for any damage to the owners of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out section 5.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 5. It shall not be lawful for any person or persons to take possession of, or make use of for any exclusive purpose, build upon, alter, deface, injure, obstruct, or in any other manner impair the usefulness of any sea-wall, bulkhead, jetty, wharf, pier, or other work built by the United States for the preservation and improvement of any of its navigable waters, or boundary-marks, tide-gauges, surveying stations, buoys, or other established marks, nor remove for ballast or other purposes any stone or other material composing such works.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out sections 6, 7, and 11. The Chair will put them together unless a division be called for.

The Chief Clerk read the sections proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

SEC. 6. Every person, persons, or corporation offending against the provisions of this act shall, for each and every such offense, forfeit and pay a penalty of $250 (one-half, on conviction of the offender, to be paid to the informer), besides such further sum as may be found, in any action for the recovery of the penalty or penalties incurred under this act, to be the expense of making good the damage incurred, or of removing to a proper place the things deposited in violation of this act, such penalties to be recovered by action in the name of the United States in any district court within whose jurisdiction such offense shall be committed, said action to be instituted by the district attorney for such district, at the instance of any person complaining.

SEC. 7. It shall be the duty of officers and agents having the supervision, on the part of the United States, of the works in progress for the preservation and improvement of said navigable waters, and in their absence of the United States collectors of customs and other revenue officers, to enforce the provisions of this law by giving information to the district attorney of the United States for the district in which any violation of any provision of this act shall have been committed.

SEC. 11. Whenever the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that any railroad or other bridge now constructed or hereafter to be constructed over any of the navigable waters of the United States under authority of the United States or of any State or Territory, is an obstruction to the free navigation of such waters, by reason of insufficient height, width of span, or otherwise, or of difficulty in passing the draw-opening or the raft-span of said bridge by rafts, steamboats, or other water craft, it shall be his duty to cause the proper proceedings to be instituted in the circuit court of the United States within whose jurisdiction said bridge or any portion thereof may be located, to have the same condemned and removed as a public nuisance, at the expense of the person or corporation owning or maintaining said bridge, unless the owners or managers thereof shall cause the same to be altered to his satisfaction within a reasonable time prescribed by him, so that it shall not be an obstruction to navigation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. Now I want to know what sections have been stricken out.

Mr. HALE. Section 2, section 3, section 4, section 5, section 6, section 7, and section 11. Section 8 was before stricken out. Sections 9 and 10 were not included in my motion. Section 8 was stricken out by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. But has not yet been voted on by the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I now move to insert as section 2 the last clause reported by the committee as an amendment to the section. I think the provision contained is very necessary on Lake Superior.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Michigan what line in the amendment his proposition comes in?

Mr. CONGER. It is the last clause of section 2 as modified by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as section 2:

SEC. 2. That in places where harbor lines have not been established, and where such deposits can be made without injury to navigation, within lines to be established by the Secretary of War, said officer may, and is hereby, authorized to cause such lines to be established; and within such lines such deposits may be made, under regulations to be from time to time prescribed by him.

Mr. DOLPH. If there appeared to be any necessity for this amendment I should not oppose it, but as the matter now stands there is no law of the United States to prevent any man from dumping anything that he pleases in any harbor or navigable river of the United States, and the Senate have just said by a vote that they will not pass such a law when they have an opportunity to do it. There is no law to prevent a bridge being built anywhere over any navigable river or other navigable water within the limits of the United States under the authority of a law of any State notwithstanding it may be an obstruction to commerce. The Supreme Court has held that until the United States does act, exercises jurisdiction, the State may authorize obstructions to navigable rivers wholly within these limits.

The Senate have virtually said they do not wish to regulate the matter of bridges; that they will not authorize the Secretary of War, as provided in section 4 of the bill, to remove a sunken vessel after it has remained in a navigable channel to the obstruction of navigation sixty days. They have said virtually that they do not want to provide a penalty for men who shall unlawfully occupy, injure, and destroy public works constructed and being constructed by appropriations of money by the Government.

There does not, therefore, appear to be any necessity for this amendment. Any individual may deposit what he pleases in any navigable river, harbor, or stream of the United States without being liable criminally; of course he can be prosecuted civilly for damages if he injure a public work. That being the condition of the law, there is no necessity for the amendment; it seems we do not want any law on any of these subjects.

Mr. CONGER. In all large places and towns harbor-lines are always established to control the filling in of the harbor or channel. In some places where there are small places where there is no civil authority it is very desirable for the preservation of narrow channels that the débris of mines and stamp-works shall not be put into the channel. This can do no harm, and will be a valuable thing in many places to allow what is the equivalent of harbor-lines in cities to be established where it is thought desirable to limit the places where débris may be deposited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. TELLER (when Mr. BOWEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], but I have the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] to transfer my pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I therefore transfer the pair of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the Senator from Kansas, and vote "nay."

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. HARRISON. I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAWYER. I was paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], but that pair has been transferred.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Brown,	Eustis,	Logan,	Payne,
Call,	Frye,	McMillan,	Pugh,
Coke,	George,	Maxey,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Gibson,	Miller,	Sherman,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Spooner,
Dolph,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Vest.

NAYS—18.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Walthall,
Berry,	Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Whitthorne,
Blair,	Gray,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Butler,	Hale,	Teller,
Dawes,	Harris,	Van Wyck,

ABSENT—34.

Aldrich,	Fair,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Beck,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Saulsbury,
Blackburn,	Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Morgan,	Stanford,
Camden,	Hearst,	Morrill,	Vance,
Cameron,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pike,	Voorhees,
Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Colquitt,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to offer an amendment: in section 1, on page 45, line 1089, after the word "dollars," to add the words:

And $12,000, to be expended on the river at Grayville, Ill.

That amendment is substantially the amendment that was offered before. It proposes to add $12,000 to the item of appropriation for the Mississippi River. I offer it for the reason that it is very important that there should be no uncertainty as to an appropriation to take care of that specific point on the river. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I think from what the Senator from Illinois has said that this work ought to be done at the point indicated here. My only objection before was that it was subtracting from an appropriation where the whole was needed. I hope this amendment inserting that amount as an addition will be carried.

Mr. CULLOM. I propose to add the small amount of $12,000 in addition to the item specified in the bill; that is, in line 1089, the words:

And $12,000 additional, to be expended on the river at Grayville, Ill.

Mr. HARRISON. Do not put in the word "additional."

Mr. CULLOM. I will leave out the word "additional."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1089, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to add:

And $12,000, to be expended on the river at Grayville, Ill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be subject to a point of order as a new appropriation.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope if there is any point of order it is subject to that it will not be made, as it is very important that there shall be money for the protection of the river at that particular point, and it is a small item.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make any point.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that we had better adopt the language of the bill and allow the clause to remain just as it is, increasing the amount.

Mr. CULLOM. I would have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has already been voted down.

Mr. ALLISON. But it could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Indiana insists that the amount shall not be reduced, and I hope the amendment will be adopted as I propose it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. In line 756, before the word "dollars," I move to strike out "fourteen thousand" and insert "twenty-three thousand three hundred;" so as to read:

Improving Romely Marsh, Georgia: To complete improvement, $23,300.

I beg the Senate to hear me less than five minutes on this question, for I shall not take that much time to explain it. I wish to say a word about what Romely Marsh is.

There is an inland channel which extends around the coast of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia into Florida, and there is a line of boats that run on the inland channel from Jacksonville to Savannah. There is a marsh called Romely Marsh on the way, about 40 miles below Savannah. It is a large and winding creek, and without a canal which has just been cut through the boats would run 2 or 3 miles to get over three-quarters of a mile of the route. Boats have been going through, and whenever they strike low tide they had to lie over for hours before they could pass, waiting for the tide to rise.

The improvement was made to get a canal from deep water on one side of the marsh to deep water on the other, and boats are now running through, as the canal is completed.

First $10,000 was appropriated to the work. That amount was expended. The tide running across it, and the channel not being open through to give itself vent, the canal as far as it was cut filled up very rapidly. There was another $10,000 appropriated, but that went the same way; that is, by the filling up there was a good deal of it lost.

Then the Secretary of War, when the appropriation of the second $10,000 was exhausted, authorized the contractor, who was doing the work very cheaply, to go on and complete the canal across the marsh, and, as I understand, the Secretary was to recommend an appropriation. Not doubting that the appropriation would be made, the contractor went on and completed the work. The consent of the Secretary was given because of the washing of the tide across the marsh, filling up the canal. And it was necessary that it be cut through, so that the water could pass off and keep the canal clear by the rush of the water through it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long ago was that?

Mr. BROWN. That was in the present administration. I do not remember exactly when it was.

Mr. HALE. Was the obstruction more noticeable at the end of the work than when it began?

Mr. BROWN. I will come to that in a moment, if the Senator will excuse me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How did the Secretary of War under the prohibitive statutes have any authority to authorize this work to be done at all when there was no money to pay for it?

Mr. BROWN. I understand he authorized the contractor to go on and complete the work, and that he would recommend an appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly in the face of the prohibitive act of Congress.

Mr. BROWN. In that way the contractor has gone forward and completed the work. I understand a very honored citizen of New Jersey is the man who undertook the work, and he has done it very faithfully. It has been completed since the additional report or estimate was made by the Chief of Engineers or by General Gillmore, who was the engineer in charge, whose report was sent up and approved by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. TELLER. How much is due him?

Mr. BROWN. Twenty-three thousand three hundred dollars is due him, and due for supervision and extras, as General Gillmore states in his report, which I will ask the Secretary to read, and then my speech is made.

However, to save time, I will simply state that the annual estimate was that it would take $14,000 to complete the work. Since the work is completed General Gillmore says it took $23,300, including some little extras there were about it, to complete the work, and the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, as I understand it, approve the last requisition or estimate of $23,300 to pay the debt.

I stated that the steamers are running through, and I am informed they do it now on schedule time at low tide as well as high tide. As much as was said about the marsh, there is no appropriation that has been made by Congress in my State of forty-odd thousand dollars that has accomplished as much for the cause of navigation and the convenience of travel between two important States of the Union as this little appropriation. The estimate shows that since the annual estimate was made up the amount has been increased, and that it is necessary, in order to pay for this work, that the appropriation be increased to $23,300.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a pretty dangerous precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. In lines 528 and 529:

Improving Hudson River, New York: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "thirty-five" before the word "thousand;" and at the end of the line to add:

Of which $20,000 may be used for the removal of the rock in the channel at Van Wie's Point.

I presented this amendment to the committee and supposed it was in the bill. I was called away necessarily for a few days, and upon my return the bill was ready to be reported. When I found that it was not in the bill the chairman of the committee suggested that rather than delay the bill a day in reporting it I should wait until the bill was considered by the Senate, and then I could move the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. What is the entire amount of the appropriation asked for?

Mr. MILLER. The amount of the appropriation asked for is $40,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not want to object to these amendments continually increasing appropriations, but I do think that it is due to the Senate that when Senators ask for these appropriations and these additions to the bill that they ought at least to tell us why.

One objection from any member of the committee can deprive me of the right to offer an amendment, yet I find that the committee which a year ago objected to any and everything that was offered which did not proceed under a rule that they themselves seemed to have adopted are now not objecting as they did then. I ask for a reason.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that he has not a right himself to offer any amendment to this bill that he sees fit at this time, provided he offers it in accordance with the rules of this body.

I shall not detain the Senate to go into this matter. This is a rock which projects out into the channel of the Hudson River and very frequently detains boats. Some money has been spent upon it but not enough to remove it, and it is very desirable for the whole navigation of the river that this work shall be done. I will simply say that the State of New York has appropriated for a great many years from $30,000 to $50,000 to aid the navigation on that river.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I raise the point of order, and I object to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order being raised, the Chair is of opinion that unless the amendment is reported from a committee it is not in order.

Mr. MILLER. This was in the bill as I understand it and was dropped out, but I do not understand that the point of order can be made upon these questions. All these appropriations have been estimated for, and that question was decided by the Chair several days ago. This has been properly estimated for in the engineer's report, as much so as any other item in the bill. If no amendment can be moved and the point of order can be made against every amendment, of course there is no occasion for going on and considering the bill any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the point of order raised by the Senator from Virginia is that the amendment was not reported from the committee or was not estimated for. If it is either it is in order.

Mr. MILLER. It is both. It was estimated for, and it was simply a mistake in the making up of the bill that it was not put in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from New York says that the amendment was reported from the committee or was estimated for by the Department it is in order.

Mr. MILLER. It fills the rule in every direction.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not understand what the Senator said about its being reported from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York says it was estimated for in the regular estimates of the Department.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That does not answer the rule of the Senate, if the Chair will allow me to state it. I was required here at the last session of Congress to show by a report that the chairman and that the Committee on Commerce agreed to an appropriation that the committee recommended. It is not a question of the estimate, but the amendment must be referred to its appropriate committee and reported from that committee.

Mr. President, I do not mean to take any exception to your ruling in this matter; but the point of order was raised upon me last year when the James River appropriation was pending. The point of order was made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who now sits just in front of me, and who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. That was on a different bill

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. A different bill and a different man, perhaps.

Mr. MILLER. I am entirely within the estimate, and in addition to that, the amendment was considered by the committee and the facts are just as I have stated them. I was authorized by the committee to move it to the bill rather than wait and have the bill reprinted. There can not be any question about it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I still raise the point of order and object to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion upon a careful reading of the rule that if an amendment is either moved by the direction of a standing committee or proposed in pursuance of the estimate of some one of the Departments, it is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is another part of the rule which says that amendments to the river and harbor bill shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; so that if the Senator from New York were not authorized by the committee to report it from that committee I think there is another clause that would sustain the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MILLER. I stated that I was authorized to report it from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second clause of Rule XVIII provides that—

In like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriations to river and harbor bills shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

If that has not been done the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment would fall within the prohibition of the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from New York say that he is directed by the Committee on Commerce to report this amendment?

Mr. MILLER. I do. The amendment, as I understand it, was adopted by the Committee on Commerce, but it fell out of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. That does not answer the question. Is he directed to offer this amendment now to the bill by the Committee on Commerce or any other committee?

Mr. MILLER. I have said at least half a dozen times within the last three minutes that I was so authorized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that that is sufficient. The Senator states that he is authorized by the committee to offer the amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair only for the purpose of making this additional statement, that being ruled out of order here all the time in these matters, I insist that that answer does not measure up to be what is generally required here, and that when I came into the Senate Chamber advocating that which was not objected to by Senators themselves on the merits of the case, to wit, the James River improvement, I was required to go around and ask the members of the Committee on Commerce to sign their names to the report.

I do not intend to stand here in the Senate and allow any Senator, I care not whether he is from the State of New York or new anything else, to have advantages or privileges that I can not enjoy. That is just all of it.

The Senator says he is directed by the committee to report the amendment. Then let us have the report of that committee. If it had been I, I would have been required to offer my amendment here and ask to have it printed and referred to its appropriate committee; and the formal report of the committee would have been required.

Whenever I shall fail to assert a right that belongs to me I shall feel like quitting here and going home and saying that the Senate Chamber ought only to be left to two or three States, and ought to have no representatives in it except those who come from those States.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I withdraw the appeal. I merely wanted to make those remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that, as the Senator from New York states he is authorized to move the amendment by direction of a standing committee, the amendment is in order. The Chair understands his statement to be substantially that.

Mr. HARRIS. It is clearly in order upon the statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is directed by a standing committee to offer the amendment, and so it is in order. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. In line 408, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Ashland, Wis.: Continuing improvement, $30,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object, for the purpose of saying that I do not believe in this way of increasing appropriations in the bill, and having expressed my opinion I shall let the matter rest there.

Mr. SPOONER. I think with one word of explanation there is hardly a Senator here who will object to this amendment.

Ashland is a city of about 4,000 inhabitants on Lake Superior in my State, 60 miles east of Duluth. It is a city with many elements of permanent prosperity. It is the lake port of a mineral region not rivaled in extent or in richness in the United States.

The estimate for this improvement was $136,000, and the appropriation made by the bill is only $20,000. The commerce of that port deserves more attention than it has received from the committee. It is the terminus of four railroads, the Northern Pacific Railway, the Omaha Railway, the Wisconsin Central Railway, and the Milwaukee, Lake Shore and Western Railway. It has one of the largest iron-ore docks in the world. I submit to the Senate that the appropriation is too far below the estimate, and it was not made on the principle which has apparently been the guide as to other appropriations.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I raise the point of order. ["Too late!"]

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, it is not too late.

Mr. ALLISON. You can not raise the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 1131, after the words "one hundred" and before "thousand," I move to insert the words "and fifty;" so as to read:

Improving Illinois River, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

The committee have appropriated $100,000. By the reading of the report of the engineer it will be found that up to July 1, 1885, the amount expended for the fiscal year, exclusive of outstanding liabilities, was $63,992.64; July 1, 1885, liabilities, twenty-three thousand and odd dollars; making, in all, $87,542.40. The amount required for the completion of the work is $700,000. The amount which can be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, is $350,000.

I desire to say in regard to the improvement of the Illinois River from Hennepin to the mouth that the State of Illinois expended a large amount for the purpose of building two locks and dams; and for the continuation of the work by the Government, it being a very important work, for the purpose of dredging and deepening the river and building other locks, it is necessary, if there is anything intended to be done for the purpose of improving that river, that we should appropriate enough at least to do some good. One hundred thousand dollars will not complete it nor half complete it, and I think the committee ought at least to have appropriated one-half the amount which is required for the expenditure during this fiscal year.

I ask that $50,000 be added to the $100,000 for the reason that that is not half the amount recommended and asked for by the engineers who have the work in charge. They ask for $350,000 to be expended this year.

That is all I have to say about it. It is a very important improvement. I do not think the improvements in Illinois have very extravagant appropriations. I do not complain of that; but the appropriations for that State are not large in comparison with others. I ask that this amount shall be allowed there, because it is very necessary that $150,000 should be appropriated.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I raise the point of order that there is no report from the committee in favor of this increase.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that unless the amendment——

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the President of the Senate will withhold his decision until the facts are stated. I offered an amendment proposing to increase this item myself, which was referred to the committee, and I understand that brings it within the rule. The committee saw proper not to report in favor of the increase, but I do not know how else we could bring a question of this kind before the Senate so as to have it in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator offer an amendment and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. CULLOM. I offered an amendment to increase this item from $100,000 to $200,000. The estimate is $350,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is clearly in order if the amendment was sent to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought so, and only desired to disabuse the mind of the chairman of the committee on that point.

Mr. LOGAN. The estimate is $350,000 for this fiscal year.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is the estimate, but if these appropriations are all increased to the amount of the estimates——

Mr. LOGAN. But this does not increase it to the amount of the estimate, nor to half the estimate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amount of the estimate is $350,000 for the current fiscal year.

Mr. LOGAN. And you have not given one-third of what was estimated.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is the bill as it passed the House, but the amount of this bill is so large now——

Mr. LOGAN. The amount of the bill has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It has to do with the consideration of the Senate certainly in increasing any of these items.

Mr. LOGAN. But it has nothing to do with this proposition. I do not make any reference to the committee, but if the item is not treated in proportion to the estimates, what the balance of the bill may amount to has nothing to do with the justice of this proposition.

It is a mere question whether this is right or wrong. I will venture the assertion that there are very few appropriations in the bill where more than one-third of the estimate has not been appropriated; and this is not a third of the estimate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amendment being in order, of course I can only state the objection of the committee to increasing the appropriation.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say one word in addition to what has been said. This proposed appropriation is for the purpose specially of proceeding with the work of finishing the two locks that were referred to a day or two ago in the discussion of the improvement of the Illinois River. The amount appropriated from year to year for that work is so small that the work is damaged almost as much each year as progress is made in completing it, as the report of the Secretary of War will show.

The bill provides that a portion of the $100,000 appropriated shall be expended on another portion of the river, so that it will be a very small item that will be used in the construction of the two locks and dams in the lower part of the Illinois River as specified in the report of the Secretary of War and the engineers.

I hope that the amendment offered by my colleague will be adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to say again that I base my opposition to this increase upon the general opposition that I intend all the time to prefer against this bill. We will just take this very case, and I ask if there is a Senator here who would dare to go into his State Legislature and enact a law written like this in an appropriation bill:

The grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its right of way, and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State of Illinois may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State of Illinois by the United States for canal purposes, made to the United States by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved April 28, 1882, be, and is hereby, accepted, &c.

Here is the United States Senate, putting in not only a provision of that kind as a preamble to the law, but the law itself; and I undertake to say there is not a Senator on this floor who has ever read it, and that no Senator knows what he is voting for when he votes for it,

Mr. LOGAN. Voting for what?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. For this canal grant. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he he can tell us?

Mr. LOGAN. Tell you what?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. What this canal grant is.

Mr. LOGAN. I could if it was in question, but it is not the question before the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have misunderstood that, and nothing that seems to me or to some others on this floor to amount to a question is ever answered by those who never know how to answer. We are asked to give $100,000 more. We are asked just to throw it out, give it all about, and to base it upon a statute of your own State, when you do not condescend to tell us what we are obligating ourselves to do when we are adopting the preamble of your bill. I have uttered all I want to say on the subject, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. VAN WYCK. I wish to state that on the passage of the bill I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] who has been required by sickness to leave the Chamber, and I shall withhold my vote on amendments which may be supposed to be antagonistic to his own views. I vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. BROWN. My colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. Neither is present at this time, and I will announce the pair once for the evening. They are paired on all questions.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 24; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. In line 228, after the word "hundred" and before the word "thousand," I move to insert the words "and fifty," and after the word "dollars," in line 229, to add:

Of which $2,000 may be expended at Gilbert's Bar on Indian River, and $10,000 at Tampa, Fla.

So as to read:

Improving Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida: Continuing improvement $150,000, of which $2,000 may be expended at Gilbert's Bar on Indian River, and $10,000 at Tampa, Fla.

This restores the amount for Cumberland Sound to what was appropriated by the House.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amendment increasing the amount has been acted upon already, I think, unfavorably.

Mr. CALL. But I do not propose to increase the amount beyond what was in the bill as it came to the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. But the amendment itself has been acted upon and the Senate has refused to increase the amount from $100,000 to $150,000. I think therefore the amendment is not in order now.

Mr. CALL. I submit that it is in order to move to restore the amount which was stricken out by the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will reserve the amendment, when the bill is reported to the Senate it can be voted on separately.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Florida moves to insert those words with additional words. It is plainly in order now, under the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not in order under the rule, in my opinion, because it proposes to reinsert the $50,000 which has been stricken out by the vote of the Senate, and adds words appropriating $2,000 and $10,000, making $12,000 of the $50,000. It will be in order, I grant, when the bill is reported to the Senate, but it is not in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is not now in order. It will be in order to move the words separately as an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a matter which does not concern me, but the Chair is plainly wrong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not be in order now to restore the words which have been stricken out in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chair is clearly right.

Mr. CALL. I move an entirely new provision in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Senator moves to restore words which have been stricken out in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. No, I do not——

Mr. HARRIS. Do you not move to restore "and fifty," so as to make the amount $150,000?

Mr. CALL. I will move to insert "and forty-nine," then, so that it will read "$149,000, of which $2,000 shall be expended at Gilbert's Bar on Indian River, and $10,000 at Tampa, Fla."

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suppose that is not in order either.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On what ground does the Senator claim that it is not in order?

Mr. MCMILLAN. On the ground that $49,000 is less than $50,000, and that $50,000 have been stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate might be willing to give the improvement $49,000 additional and not give $50,000 additional. The Chair can not rule it out of order on that ground.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that dividing the appropriation for Cumberland Sound by placing $10,000 or $12,000, whatever the amount is, across in Florida at Tampa Bay is not in order under any report of a committee or an estimate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It makes an entirely new item of appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. It makes an entirely new item. There is another point which the Senator named. I do not recollect it. He is proposing to distribute the appropriation all around Florida. He is scattering it about miscellaneously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion, upon looking at the rule, that it would not be in order to move the amendment now, especially as the Senator has his remedy in the Senate when the question will be on concurring in this very amendment, and he can reserve it for a separate vote.

Mr. HARRISON. I move an amendment which does not increase the amount of the appropriation. In line 1096, after the word "used," I move to strike out the words:

In dredging the river between the Forks and a point half a mile east of Hammond.

And to insert:

Between the Forks, one-half mile east of Hammond, Ind., $7,500 of which are to be used in dredging the river between the Forks and the State line of Illinois and Indiana, and one-half to be expended on the river at Hammond, Ind.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to that amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The objection to this amendment is that the engineer would have the power to expend this money as he deemed best for the public service.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to prevail.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to call for the yeas and nays on this question, but I will ask that the vote be taken again. It is no increase of the appropriation at all. It simply provides for an equal division of the amount between the part of the river which is in Illinois and that part of it which is in Indiana.

In addition to that, this appropriation was increased $5,000 upon my motion in committee, and it leaves for Illinois now $25,000 on that side of the line in addition to one-half of this sum of $15,000. It certainly is entirely reasonable. It simply gives to that part of the river on the Indiana side one-half of the $15,000, and leaves on the Illinois side $25,000 to start with and then $7,500.

Mr. LOGAN. I raise the point of order in reference to the amendment that it changes the entire sense of the sentence.

Improving Calumet River, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $40,000; of which $15,000 are to be used in dredging the river between the Forks and a point half a mile east of Hammond.

That follows exactly the direction of the engineers.

Provided, however, That no part of said sum, nor any sum heretofore appropriated, except the said $15,000 for the river above the Forks, shall be expended until the entire right of way, as set forth in Senate Executive Document No. 9—

Which document is here, the report of the engineers in reference to it. The line upon which this is to be expended is the line reported by the engineers, and they report that the work should not be undertaken unless the right of way be given to the Government free of expense.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill itself provides that as to this whole $15,000 that provision shall not apply. The bill as it came from the House provides that this appropriation, except the $15,000, shall not be expended until the right of way is given.

Mr. LOGAN. The language is:

That no part of said sum, nor any sum heretofore appropriated, except the said $15,000 for the river above the Forks, shall be expended, &c.

That is true.

Mr. HARRISON. My amendment relates to the $15,000.

Mr. LOGAN. There was an appropriation some years ago to build a cut or slip, as it is called, for that portion into Calumet Lake, and that report has been made.

Mr. HARRISON. That is entirely below, and there is a separate appropriation for the Calumet Harbor of a large sum of money.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not understand what I am speaking about. I understand something about the harbor. The Senator will find that in reference to Calumet Harbor that is one thing. The Calumet Harbor is considered a harbor of safety up to a certain point. This is for the purpose of opening the river, or straightening the river; in other words, cutting it straight through a point and making a harbor continuous up to the Forks. Then the intention of the engineer was to cut a slip through from the river to Calumet Lake.

There were $50,000 appropriated some time ago for that purpose but it was not expended. The committee have left out entirely the appropriation for cutting the slip through according to the former report of the engineers, and provide only an appropriation to go to the Forks within about a half a mile across to Hammond.

Mr. HARRISON. There is another appropriation for the Calumet Harbor in this bill. I will show it to the Senator in a moment, if I can find it.

Mr. LOGAN. There is an appropriation for Calumet Harbor, but I am not talking about the harbor. I am speaking about the appropriation that is made now to cut through this slip, and it is to cut another slip through from the river to Calumet Harbor, which has been entirely left out in the appropriation. It has not been mentioned; and the reason why I did not suggest it and offer an amendment in accordance with the report of the engineers was because I saw there was no use to offer amendments after the fate of the one I offered for the Illinois River. Let me read what the estimate is:

2. Calumet Harbor, Illinois.—The present project for the improvement of this harbor has for its object the creation and maintenance of a channel 300 feet wide and 16 feet deep, from Lake Michigan to Calumet River.

The amount expended in the execution of this project to June 30, 1885, is $380,774.41; 5,360 feet of pier-work have been completed, and 384,376 cubic yards of material have been dredged from the channel. During the past season the south pier was extended 200 feet, and 748 linear feet of revetment was rebuilt.

The appropriation of $21,400 asked for is to be applied to extending the south pier and to the repair and preservation of the existing piers.

That is what the Senator referred to in reference to the harbor.

The officer in charge, in a communication to this office of December 3, 1884, which was transmitted to Congress, printed in House Executive Document No. 36 of the last session, called attention to the extension of the north shore-line caused by deposits of slag, &c., from the works of the North Chicago rolling-mills. These deposits, if continued, will call for a further extension of the piers, and additional appropriation will have to be made by Congress. Whereas if they were discontinued, it is believed that no further appropriation need be made except that now called for, and small amounts occasionally to preserve the work and maintain the dredged channel in good condition.

That is the channel of the river, and the piers and works that have been built along close to the lake, known as the old Calumet Harbor; but the appropriation is for the continuation and for the extension up the river, cutting it through and straightening it and dredging it out. The intention was to run a slip across from the river to the lake; but that has not been provided for.

The amendment proposes a diversion of the appropriation and a change from the recommendation of the engineers, who have made a report which I have here in my hand; but I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in discussing it. I am satisfied that any one who will examine the map and the report will see that this will be an entire diversion from what the engineers intend and from what the bill intends.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is up.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the opposition of the Senator from Illinois is not generous in reference to this matter. Upon my motion $5,000 was added to this item in the bill as it came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is also out of order, his time having expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Hammond is a very important and thriving town. There are some large industries there, perhaps an investment of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000. The Senator gets the benefit of part of the river and he gets the $42,000, including $10,000 for Calumet Harbor. My amendment simply provides that $7,500, of which $5,000 was an increase made upon my motion, shall be expended upon that portion of the river within the State of Indiana.

I think if the Senator will consider a moment he will not insist on opposing the amendment, as this amount has been increased $5,000 upon my motion. If it had stood as the House left it he gets now nearly as much as he would then, only $25,000 more being expended upon that part of the river within the State of Indiana and $42,000 is spent on that part of the river within the State of Illinois. It seems to me it is a very small matter that I ask for this important part of the river and the town of Hammond and the important industries on the river near that town, the small sum of $7,500, especially when $5,000 of that has been put in on my motion with a view to this very purpose. I think if the Senator reflects a moment he will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I presume the Senator thinks it is not generous because I do not see how an improvement of the Calumet River along there would be an improvement of the river in front of Hammond as well as anywhere else; but to use $7,500 out of the small appropriation to improve right in front of the little town when the whole remainder of the river is to be improved, I do not think is exactly the thing.

Mr. HARRISON. The whole remainder of the river gets $32,000, and at this particular part of the river, within the State of Indiana, I only ask that $7,500 be spent, instead of leaving it so that the whole of the appropriation of $40,000 may be expended on the river altogether. There are needed improvements there, and it is a very small thing to ask that this little appropriation shall be spent for that purpose when $5,000 was added on my own motion.

Mr. LOGAN. Well——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind both Senators that they have had their five minutes under the rule.

Mr. LOGAN. I never object to anything that is fair, but the Senator says I am not generous about this thing, when I certainly do not make any objection except that it is impossible to expend this money unless along the whole river. The idea of taking a portion of it and expending it right in front of one little place is in my judgment perfectly absurd.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not proposed to spend it in front of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to know where you will expend it then, because the river is in front of the town.

Mr. HARRISON. All I ask is that it shall be spent at Hammond, that part of the appropriation which is to be spent in Indiana.

Mr. LOGAN. The object then, I admit is, to be plain about it, if the engineer's report is to be carried out cutting across that point, the diversion of this money would be to prevent cutting through that point so as to keep this open around by Hammond. That is the whole of it. I shall object to it, sir, but the Senate may do as they please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. In line 904, after the word "dollars," I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That if, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, it shall be necessary, the sum of $13,000 may be expended at Fort Smith, $10,000 at Dardanelle, and $8,000 at Pine Bluff.

Mr. CONGER. I ask if that increases the appropriation.

Mr. BERRY. It does not. It simply provides that it shall be expended at these points as in the opinion of the engineer is necessary. The matter was submitted to the chairman of the committee by my colleague, and I understood from him that the Senator from Minnesota had no objection to the amendment. It does not increase the appropriation at all; it simply provides that so much of the amount already appropriated may be expended in a certain way if in the opinion of the Secretary of War it is necessary.

Mr. CONGER. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Can not a point of order be raised on the amendment? Has it gone to the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that it does not increase the appropriation, and therefore it is in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Can any amendment be offered to a bill of this kind until it first goes through the routine that was required at the last session? That is my point. I am not unfriendly to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is in order. It does not increase the appropriation. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. In line 234, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

Of which $2,000 may be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War on the Carabello, or Crooked River.

So as to read:

Improving harbor at Apalachicola Bay, Florida: Continuing improvement, $12,000; of which $2,000 may be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War on the Carabello, or Crooked River.

I will state that that is part of the harbor of Apalachicola, and it has been recommended, and an estimate was made for it in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it is a part of the harbor the engineer would have the power to expend a portion of the money appropriated by the bill in the improvement of that harbor.

Mr. CALL. It is a separate item and a separate work.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then if it is separate——

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator that it is recommended and desired by the people there, as the collector informs me, and it is a part of Apalachicola Bay, at the entrance to Apalachicola Bay, for ships of deep draught; and it is desired that this discretion may be allowed in the improvement.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it is a part of the same improvement, certainly the engineer would have the privilege of applying the money as he deemed it best for the public interest.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment leaves it to his discretion.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it is not a part of the same improvement it is not in order, because it is a different item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. In line 238, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Pensacola, Fla.: Continuing improvement, $40,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope that increase will not be made here. The appropriation of $20,000 made by the House is one-third of the estimate, and is about as large as should be made by the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a point of order?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not know whether a point of order would lie against it or not under the ruling of the Chair, that an amendment referred to the committee would make the amendment in order. I raise the point of order for the purpose of determining that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the amendment been referred to the committee?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not know.

Mr. CALL. It has been, though I am not certain about the amount.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire whether under the rule it is necessary to refer an amendment which is in pursuance of an estimate to the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule expressly so requires. Rule XVI requires that "in like manner amendments proposing new items"——

Mr HOAR. New items, but not increasing old ones.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that—

In like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

And that has been held also to apply to the increase of an appropriation.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me. I do not wish to delay the Senate at this time; but the distinction between a new item of appropriation and an item increasing an appropriation is marked. The first clause of Rule XVI provides that—

No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add a new item of appropriation unless, &c.

That clearly shows that they are two distinct things, and that the increase of an appropriation is not a new item under the rule. Then if that comes "in pursuance of an estimate" it is not prohibited by the first clause.

Then the second clause, which speaks of river and harbor bills only, says:

Amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

But the other kind, which is a separate kind in the same rule, merely increasing items within the estimates, I submit to the Chair is in order. However, it is not of practical importance now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate. The Chair is still of opinion, taking the first and second clauses together, that the same rule must be applied to any increase of appropriation as to a new item. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] submits an amendment; the question is whether it is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. If the question of order is to be made I desire to make an additional suggestion upon it. In respect to river and harbor bills, what is an estimate within the technical sense of the rule? I maintain that there is no estimate that the Chair can recognize in the technical sense of the rule except that estimate sent by the Secretary of the Treasury; but I think the habit here has been to refer to the estimates which the engineers have made, and they have been referred to as estimates. Now before it is legitimate to offer to increase, or to make a new item of appropriation, the estimate made and sent to the two Houses of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury in the Book of Estimates must be shown.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has avoided deciding that question, because it has not been raised, whether or not any estimate has been made by the Secretary of War in regard to rivers and harbors; but the estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury being a sum in gross would not be applicable to this bill under the rule. Therefore the Chair would not like to decide the question as to an estimate. The Chair is of opinion that if the Senator from Florida had a regular reference to the Committee on Commerce——

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir; it was referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MCMILLAN and Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 238, it is proposed to strike out "twenty," before "thousand," and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Pensacola, Fla.: Continuing improvement, $30,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. On page 11, section 1, line 240, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Tampa Bay, Florida: Continuing improvement, $20,000.

That amendment has been referred to the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the amount of the appropriations will not be increased. The appropriations are made for all these rivers in consonance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I move, on page 11, section 1, line 241, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Cedar Keys, Fla., $10,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The same objection applies in this as in the former cases.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President, in line 767 of section 1, page 32, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

To include the improvement of bar in San Carlos Bay, near the mouth of Caloosahatchee River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How near the mouth is that?

Mr. CALL. It is near enough to be an impediment to the entrance of the Caloosahatchee River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a new item of appropriation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is a new item.

Mr. CALL. It can not be possible that it can be a new item in the bill. Caloosahatchee River is from the mouth to its source, and San Carlos Bay is in Caloosahatchee River, and it is not possible for any language to make a distinction of that character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is in the Caloosahatchee River, the amendment is entirely unnecessary and superfluous and misleading. It makes a different proposition from the one that is now in the bill. Otherwise it is merely a perfectly inefficacious proposition anyhow.

Mr. CALL. I submit that the Senator is entirely incorrect. There is no foundation for that idea. The Caloosahatchee River is an entirety, and this is simply defining with more particularity in what part of the river this money may be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of War. The Caloosahatchee River has a very wide mouth discharging into the Gulf of Mexico and this is one of the little bars at the entrance.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If that is so, it is embraced in the appropriation here, and if it is not embraced in it, it is a new item, and I raise the point of order on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the statement made by the Senator from Florida the amendment would be in order, it being an application of the money appropriated. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I have not been treated very liberally. The matter is of no sort of consequence and might very well be given to Florida. In line 780, section 1, after the word "dollars," I move to insert the following words:

Of which $2,000 may be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of War on Pease River, Florida.

So as to read:

Improving Manatee River, Florida: Continuing improvement, $10,000; of which $2,000 may be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of War on Pease River, Florida.

The object is simply this: The Manatee River has a bay somewhat south of Pease River and there is an appropriation for this Pease River in this bill. The estimate of the engineer is that this amount will very nearly complete the improvement. The two rivers, the Manatee River and Bay and the Pease River, are on either side of the main channel, and I have simply asked that $2,000 may in the discretion of the Secretary of War be taken from an appropriation of $10,000 which the House sent here for the Manatee River and Bay and be applied to the Pease River, which has already $3,000 to make up the amount of the estimate of the engineers which can profitably be used during this year.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The appropriation for Pease River is embraced in the succeeding item. I suppose it would not be proper to divert a portion of this appropriation from Manatee River to Pease River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. My colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] proposed an amendment to this bill which was referred to the committee and has not been incorporated in the bill, and in his absence I propose the amendment. It contains an appropriation for the Wabash River between Vincennes and Terre Haute. Some money has been expended upon that section of the river with very good results and pretty fair navigation has been maintained. There are three or four boats belonging to one line that have plied regularly upon it, and there is important commerce on that part of the river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that above Delphi or below?

Mr. HARRISON. Below Delphi very much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Below Logansport?

Mr. HARRISON. Logansport is very much above Delphi.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 1090, after "Illinois," it is proposed to insert:

That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the improvement of the Wabash River, and to be expended between Vincennes and Terre Haute, Ind.

Mr. CONGER. Is Terra Haute above Vincennes?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. The engineer says:

Above Vincennes—The project for the improvement of this portion of the river was the removal of obstructions and the construction of wing-dams where necessary.

In addition to the amount, $304,996.19, expended on the whole river to July 1, 1880, $53,021.14 was spent on improving this portion of the river to June 30, 1884. This resulted in giving a fair navigable channel, the principal obstructions having been removed.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, $8,701.77 was expended, and the work done consisted in the removal of snags and the completion of the dam at Horseshoe Bend, whereby increased depth of water and a clearer channel was obtained.

At present it is not deemed advisable that any more money should be expended on this portion of the river until the lock and dam at Grand Rapids is completed, when an estimate for this portion of the river will be prepared.

An appropriation is made for the dam referred to, but the Engineer Department report that until that is completed they make no estimate for the improvement of the river above Vincennes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. On page 77, section 1, after line 208, I move to insert:

Umpqua River.

It is simply a survey.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Half a dozen surveys have been inserted here by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not one when I have been in.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Half a dozen. I hope there will be no objection to this. This is a larger river 60 miles from its mouth than one-half, I dare say, of the rivers in this bill within 5 miles of their mouth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the Umpqua River?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It is in the State of Oregon. It goes into the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What part of Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Southern Oregon. It runs across the State, and is a considerable river. It runs east and west.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question on the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is a survey merely. There is no appropriation for the work.

Mr. ALLISON. The appropriation will come next year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 1094 of section 1, after the word "Illinois," I ask the chairman of the committee if he has any objection to inserting the words "and connecting it with Calumet Lake;" so as to read:

Improving Calumet River, and connecting it with Calumet Lake: Continuing improvement, $40,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you explain that?

Mr. LOGAN. If any explanation is needed I explain it in this way: Calumet Lake is a large lake where improvements are being made, and a short slip cut through from the river to the lake will allow vessels to enter the lake, which is a fine lake with deep water and would make a splendid harbor. It has been favorably reported and money expended on it. This is merely for continuing it. No matter how much they may expend, only a portion is necessary to continue that, so as to keep it a part of the work. That is the only object I have. I do not add anything to the appropriation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. But there is no title to the property, is there?

Mr. LOGAN. The same rule would apply here under the bill that no work is to be done until the right of way is deeded to the Government free of charge. There is no danger of their doing anything of that kind. That is in the bill and $15,000 has already been provided for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is what the engineer says——

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, Chicago, Ill., September 10, 1884.

GENERAL: I have the honor to present the following preliminary report upon the proposed ship-canal from Calumet River to Calumet Lake, Illinois, as provided for in the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884.

As shown on the inclosed tracing, it is proposed to start the canal at Cummings, on the Calumet River, and carry it a distance of about 7,000 feet to Lake Calumet, directly opposite the town of Pullman.

As near as can be ascertained, the idea of digging a canal or ditch at the site indicated was first projected in the fall of 1874. It was claimed that a channel of some dimensions was needed for sanitary purposes, and for the purpose of preventing the overflow of the surrounding country. The site was selected as being through land that was not, at that time, subdivided, and clear titles thereto could be obtained without difficulty.

No work was done, however, but the land was put on record "as reserved for a ship-canal."

On the 16th of April, 1880, an ordinance was passed by the board of trustees of Hyde Park—

"To dredge a ditch from Brown's Mill (now called Cumming's) Slip to Lake Calumet on a line 428 feet north of and parallel with One hundred and tenth street, the bottom of said ditch to be 25 feet wide, with a uniform depth of 9 feet below the coping of Brown's dock, the sides to slope at an inclination of 2 feet horizontally to 1 foot vertically."

In pursuance of this ordinance assessments were made and put in the hands of collectors, the list being known as "Assessment No. 97 of Hyde Park." This ordinance was repealed in the summer of 1883.

The ditch, formerly proposed for drainage purposes, has now grown to the dimensions of a ship-canal. Major Lydecker, in his report of January 7, 1882, upon "the survey of the Calumet River from South Chicago to the village of Pullman, on Lake Calumet," in addition to following the main river to the forks near Lake Calumet, and thence to Pullman, estimated also upon the shorter course by way of the canal as above proposed.

Then he goes on to describe it:

This will give the adjacent property-owners a good channel through which they can gain an outlet to the lake; any work beyond this should be done by those interested and not by the Government.

That is speaking of Calumet River apparently, but I am not sure of that.

The proposed enterprise connects the Calumet River, which will have a channel depth of 16 feet, with Lake Calumet, in which the water in the deepest part is not over 6 feet.

To be utilized in any manner suitable for lake vessels, Calumet Lake must also be dredged to a depth of 16 feet; this is not proposed in the bill, but no doubt the Government would be called upon to carry it out.

The proposed work amounts, really, in fact, to the extension of Brown's Slip through the country to Lake Calumet.

While the Calumet region is fast developing into a manufacturing and industrial district, and many new enterprises are calculated to be entered into at an early date, I can not see that the commercial value of the proposed canal at the present time puts it upon a basis sufficient to warrant its being deemed worthy of improvement by the Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. H. BENYAURD,
Major of Engineers.

Brig. Gen. JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is any objection to the amendment I do not insist on it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to vote against it.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall not press the amendment if there is any objection to it. The work has been commenced at one part, and I think it is a very important thing; but inasmuch as there is no estimate I suppose I can not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CALL. I have an amendment to offer, though I suppose it will be objected to. In section 12, on page 70, line 37, I move to strike out the word "Newport" and insert "the Wakulla Springs;" so as to read:

Wakulla River from its mouth to the Wakulla Springs.

It is in the provision for the survey of the river. Wakulla Springs is the proper term.

Mr. FRYE. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. In the same section, after line 39, I move to insert:

Saint Augustine, Fla., for a deep-sea channel on the outer bar.

I will state that it has been recently discovered, as I am informed, that there is a very deep channel found upon the outer bar of the harbor at Saint Augustine. The Gulf Stream comes nearer to the shore there than anywhere else along the coast, and it is very desirable, if practicable, that a deeper channel should be formed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. This is a mere survey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the amendment which I submitted some time ago be now read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 1243, in section 1, it is proposed to add:

Provided, That Congress may at any time hereafter be released from the obligations imposed by the acceptance of this grant by a surrender to the State of Illinois of the said canal and all its appurtenances, including all improvements which may be made thereon.

Mr. CALL. That is intended to provide, in case the United States shall not deem it proper to continue the construction of the Hennepin Canal, that it may be surrendered to the State of Illinois and prevent its being a continuous and permanent contract.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is offered here as an amendment this evening for the first time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not contain an appropriation; it is a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is an amendment to the bill, and I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I would make one suggestion to the Senator from Florida. It takes two to make a contract. If the Government of the United States accepts this property and it becomes a ship-canal, I do not think the Government could surrender it to the State unless the State consented to receiving it.

I object to the proposition, and I hope the Senate will at least not encumber the proposition in the bill with a clause so absurd as this is for the purpose of defeating it. If the Senate want to defeat the proposition, when it comes into the Senate let them do it upon its merits; but I hope it will not be strangled in this way so as to put it in a shape to defeat it before we get the bill through. If the Senator will not withdraw the amendment, I hope the Senate will vote it down. It certainly can not aid the Government or facilitate the matter in any way whatever. If the Government accepts the cession from the State of Illinois a question of law would arise then that I do not care about discussing at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. That is a very important amendment, and a very necessary one, I think, for the protection of the interests of the Government of the United States. An amendment was adopted by the Senate accepting the grant made by the State of Illinois of the Illinois and Michigan Canal on certain terms and conditions. These terms and conditions impose upon the United States obligations perpetual to keep the canal open for free navigation.

I will ask the Senate to consider what we are doing by the acceptance of this grant. Here is the act of Illinois which is accepted by the amendment adopted to this bill.

That the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its right of way and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State may now have in any real estate ceded to the State by the United States for canal purposes, be, and are hereby, ceded to the United States, for the purpose of making and maintaining an enlarged canal and water way from Lake Michigan to the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers; and this cession is made upon the condition that the United States shall, within five years from the time this act takes effect, accept this grant, and thereafter maintain the said canal and water way for the purpose aforesaid.

Unless the proposed proviso is inserted in this bill the United States come under an obligation, irrevocable, to keep this canal in repair, fit for use, free to all persons whatsoever. There is no means by which we can escape that obligation except by a repudiation of the contract, unless the proviso is inserted in the bill.

In view of the argument made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and other Senators on this floor, that it is possible, not to say probable, that in the improvements made on railroads and their means of transportation in this country in a short time this canal may be useless, it may go out of use as a means of transportation; and when that time comes, if it ever does come, the United States notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding a railroad may carry the freights more rapidly and more cheaply than the canal itself, is under obligation to keep that canal up.

The proviso puts the United States with reference to this canal in the same situation that it occupies to every other improvement in this country; that is, leaving it to the discretion of Congress at any time to continue the improvement or to cease making appropriations in that direction. I do not think it is right for us to bind our successors for all time to come to keep up an improvement which may turn out in the future not to be needed for the commerce of this country.

If the proviso is adopted, it leaves to Congress a fair and reasonable discretion to make appropriations to keep up this canal, or if circumstances shall so demand it to cease doing so. When it does that it proposes to return to the State of Illinois not only that which we get by the grant but all the improvements we may put upon it afterward. I think it is a fair and reasonable proposition which ought to be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as the obligation on the Government is concerned I will not discuss that; but all this talk about the use of canals ceasing is thrown in for a purpose, I do not know what. You might as well talk about the Mississippi River becoming entirely useless as to talk about a canal that cuts off the expense and distance this does, becoming useless. One statement would be as reasonable as another.

I will state the effect of the amendment. The main proposition might help possibly and has so far helped this bill somewhat. It has not injured it. It might possibly affect the bill beneficially in reference to its passage in either House, or it might not; but if this bill should pass at this session of Congress, and at the next session of Congress a provision should be put in the bill saying the Government would cede it back to Illinois, and therefore Illinois would have to take it back, what then? You use it as a kind of piece of machinery for a purpose one session and then destroy it the next. That is the effect of it if Congress should see fit to do so at the next session.

Mr. President, a thing is either right or wrong. This great water way and improvement will either be a benefit to this Government or it will not. If it is going to be a benefit to the Government why, I ask, should a provision of this kind be attached to it? Why is it that in the Senate of the United States at all times when Illinois has attempted any great improvements it has found opposition? Why, sir, you have never found that opposition from my State in reference to the improvement of your water ways. When your own State was anxiously asking about an appropriation bill providing for an improvement in front of your largest city, Vicksburg, I stood here and defended it; and the appropriation was made, I will not say because of what I said, but the appropriation was made and the $75,000 granted for work in front of your large city. You never have seen where anybody from the South appealed to our people in that portion of the country where aid was desired that the appeal was made in vain. But no appeal has ever been made by my State that has not met with this character of opposition that it ought not to have met with. Why it is I do not know.

I can not understand or fathom it. I find opposition on the right for one cause and on the left for another, though everything is acceded that is desired for the benefit of all other portions of the country. Once before in the Senate attacks were made on this very same proposition after every one had got everything he wanted; and the same thing is displayed now in the same manner from the same section. There is no justification whatever for it.

The State I represent contains as honorable a people as ever lived on earth. What an idea, that we shall be challenged, that we may not act properly with the Government, and therefore you must put a provision on us to compel the people of Illinois to act in good faith with this Government! They have always acted in good faith, sir, and always will. I am sorry to see the opposition that was made the other day and now, coming from those who have always been helped and benefited by the votes of the very people that you now propose to strike down.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, have I a right to reply to the Senator, or is my time out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the rule, as the Chair construes it, the Senator has the right to speak but once, but it has been ruled differently.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. In reference to the sectional allusions made by the Senator from Illinois I do not know that any reply is needed except to say that I challenge him or any other Senator on this floor to point to one single vote of mine which can be justly called a sectional vote.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not speak of it in the sense of a sectional vote; I said no such thing; I did not intimate any such thing. I said the opposition came from the same source.

Mr. GEORGE. And the same section.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; that section.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, I desire to say this further in reply to the Senator from Illinois, that I have no other business here except to discharge my duty as a Senator, and I intend to discharge that duty without reference to the opinions or the criticisms of the Senator from Illinois.

The Senator referred to his having voted for an appropriation for the city of Vicksburg. I suppose he did that because he thought the city of Vicksburg was entitled to that appropriation, and not for the purpose of securing the support of Senators who are interested in Vicksburg.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me. I voted for it because the Senators from Mississippi said it was right. I knew nothing about it. I advocated it for the reason that I believed they had made an honest statement about it. I knew nothing about it at the time or what the necessities were.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall not be behind the Senator or any other Senator here in yielding to any persuasions they may have for the interests of their own States; but when the Senator alludes to his vote for the benefit of Vicksburg he will allow me to say that he has never been called upon to enter into a contract by which the Congress of the United States was bound to all eternity to pursue any particular course with reference to that city. Whenever Vicksburg or any other improvement in the State of Mississippi has been presented here, it has been presented upon its merits, for the action of the Senate on its merits as they appear now and then at the time action was taken. There has been no effort to make any arrangement or contract by which the judgment of the Senate or the action of the Senate should be controlled in the future, when time, when experience may show that in that future such action might become improper.

The Senator alluded also to the fact, or the supposed fact, that there was an imputation upon his State in the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida. The Senator is too sensitive, Mr. President. There is no imputation of that sort. The whole object of the amendment is to put the United States with reference to that particular improvement exactly in the same position that the United States will stand with reference to every other improvement in this bill.

I do not know, I do not understand that process of reasoning by which the State of Illinois with reference to this particular improvement is to be placed in a position superior to the position which is occupied by any other State in this Union. They come here and offer to the Government of the United States this canal. They offer it as a public benefit to the people of the United States. The Senate has accepted it by a majority vote as it was offered, believing it to be a benefit to the people of the United States. But it has been argued here, and with force, with very great force, that in time this improvement may turn out not to be a benefit to the people of the United States, and the object of this amendment is simply if that time shall come that there shall be a power, a discretion on the part of Congress to do with reference to this improvement as it may do with reference to any other improvement over which it has jurisdiction; and that is all.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire to state that yesterday I was absent and by telegram requested that I should be paired on the Hennepin Canal amendment.

I do not intend to vote for this amendment if it can be construed as interfering in any way either with the acceptance of that canal by the Government of the United States or the construction of the canal. It is perfectly evident to my mind that this proviso is unnecessary. The title of this property is transferred by the State of Illinois to the Government of the United States upon a condition, an express condition, and that is, that the Government of the United States shall maintain the canal for public use. If the Government of the United States does not choose to discharge that condition and ceases to make any appropriation, the property reverts to the State of Illinois so far as the title is concerned. If this proviso be intended—and I do not know whether or not it is so intended—as a measure hostile to the Hennepin Canal, in any sense, I for one propose to vote against it.

Mr. CALL. I offered the amendment at the request of several Senators. I voted for the Hennepin Canal appropriation as I have voted upon principle for every other appropriation for national improvements. I am sorry to say that the other side have shown a very unfriendly spirit toward the State of Florida in their votes here to-night; but that has nothing to do with my action here. I am very glad that I am above any spirit of retaliation in matters of public duty.

But this amendment was not intended to injure and can not have the effect of injuring the Hennepin Canal project. It has been alleged upon this floor time and again by lawyers and others that the acceptance constituted a contract with an obligation. If there is any pretense that such is the effect, then unquestionably we should look to it. Neither the Senator from Illinois nor any other man can undertake to tell the future of the improvements of this country. It is idle for any man to assert that he can penetrate the probabilities of the future in reference to inventions and the progress of improvements. It may be that railroads may supersede, as the Senator from Connecticut argued with very great ability the other day, all these improvements. I offered the amendment in that view and in none other.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not like to take up the time of the Senate at this hour of the night and will not if the Senate will say that it would be entirely wrong to accept the amendment. I hope it will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it in order to move an adjournment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope that the Senator will withdraw that motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will withdraw it until this vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. BUTLER. I shall vote against this amendment because I am not quite sure that I should be willing after the United States Government spends six or seven million dollars on this property to convey it to the State of Illinois or anybody else.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to ask him if he would not be willing to allow the Congress of the United States to have the right, after it had spent the six or seven million dollars, to relinquish the entire improvement if it was deemed wise by the Government to do so?

Mr. BUTLER. That is exactly one point which I have just made. I would a great deal rather have a provision that the United States Government be permitted to make a sale of that property at any time if it saw fit. I do not know that I am prepared to say that after the Government shall have improved that property it may be reconveyed to the State of Illinois. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. KENNA. Suppose that within a year before we expend more that $300,000 we find it will cost three times as much as we think now it will cost to make this improvement, would it not be wise at that time to have the power to surrender it?

Mr. BUTLER. I doubt it.

Mr. KENNA. Would it be wise to put ourselves in a position that as a nation we are in honor bound to continue this important work, which we deny to the Mississippi River and all our great harbors?

Mr. BUTLER. I would very much prefer an amendment authorizing the Government to sell this property. If the State of Illinois has expended $10,000,000 on it I think it rather a royal gift. I shall vote against this amendment.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. HARRISON. I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon (after having voted in the negative). I voted under a misapprehension. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted "yea," but I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], and as his colleague [Mr. MCMILLAN] votes "nay," I withdraw my vote and announce the pair.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I am assured that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] would vote the same way that I do. I therefore vote again and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Beck,	George,	Maxey,	Vest,
Berry,	Gibson,	Platt,	Walthall,
Call,	Gray,	Ransom,	Whitthorne.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the bill be reported to the Senate.

Mr. MILLER. I wish to move an amendment for a survey; but I can move it in the Senate just as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the bill can be reported to the Senate I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to offer one amendment, to insert three words in reference to surveys, as I can not be in the Senate during a portion of the day to-morrow. In section 12, on page 70, at the end of line 45, I propose to insert, after the words "from Doboy Island to Doboy Bar," "and Jeckyl Creek."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. In section 12, at the end of line 201, where surveys in New York are provided for, I move to insert "Glen Cove Harbor."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object. I desire now to say that I reserve all points of order that I can avail myself of when these amendments are to be presented in the Senate instead of in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New York will be read.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MILLER. I have the floor. I desire to be protected in my rights.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I think the highest right a Senator can have——

Mr. MILLER. I desire to hold the floor until I can get through. No one has a right to interrupt me. My amendment is on page 76, after line 201, to insert the words "Glen Cove Harbor." Nobody can object to it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New York will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 76, line 201 of section 12, it is proposed to insert "Glen Cove Harbor."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Now, Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I ask whether that amendment was before the committee and whether it is proper to come before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is clearly in order. It makes no appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I offer as an additional section to the bill, which I ask to have printed and laid on the table, the following:

The President of the United States shall be required to expend during the fiscal year only such parts of the appropriations made by this act as he shall judge may be advantageous to the public service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida offer the amendment?

Mr. CALL. I give notice that I will offer it in the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion for the purpose of asking unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote on the passage of the bill be taken to-morrow at 4 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. MILLER. Let me suggest to the chairman of the committee that I do not see how that can possibly be done. We can commence at half past 12 to take votes in the Senate on the amendments which are reserved. No one can tell how long it will take to call the roll to arrive at a result.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have objected.

Mr. MILLER. The best thing we can do is to commence at half past 12 to-morrow and go ahead.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that at half past 12 to-morrow the Senate proceed to vote on the amendments and that debate be limited to five minutes.

Mr. HALE. That is already ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be the unfinished business at half past 12 to-morrow, and we can not make any bargain about it.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand that the agreement to limit debate to five minutes extends to to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing has been done yet as to the order for to-morrow. The Chair was about to submit the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota to the Senate. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that at 12.30 to-morrow the Senate proceed to consider the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask again the Chair to repeat it, for I could not understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent of the Senate that at 12.30 to-morrow amendments made in Committee of the Whole to this bill be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That the bill be considered under the five-minute rule or only the amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendments.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HALE. The five-minute rule has been applied to the whole bill and the amendments already.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Chair now whether that will do away with my reserved points of order on the amendments made in Committee of the Whole in the Senate, for I do know, if I have to say it myself, the difference between amendments made in committee and amendments in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All points are reserved.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 14, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 12, 1886.

MRS. SARAH YOUNG.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2113) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Young, the bill being accompanied with a message that the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment of the House will be insisted upon and the request of the Senate for a conference agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. WINANS, Mr. SWOPE, and Mr. CONGER as conferees on the part of the House.

SALE OF INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7087) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the purchase-money on the sale of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, the bill being accompanied with a message that the Senate had passed the bill with an amendment and requested a conference with the House thereon.

The SPEAKER. The bill with the amendment of the Senate will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to have this matter immediately considered?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PERKINS. This matter has already been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs; and their recommendation is that the Senate amendment be non-concurred in and that the conference asked by the Senate be granted. I ask unanimous consent that such action be taken.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment of the Senate will be non-concurred in and the request for a conference agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. WELLBORN, Mr. SKINNER, and Mr. PERKINS as conferees on the part of the House.

ALEXANDER K. SHEPARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard, with the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the amendment of the Senate to this bill. I will state that as the House passed the bill it allowed Mr. Shepard the sum of $17,000. When it went to the Senate they struck out $2,800 of the amount, and the amendment provides for allowing him the balance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There being no objection, the Senate amendment was considered and concurred in.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 807) granting a pension to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, with Senate amendments.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask unanimous consent to move concurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What effect have they?

Mr. STEELE. Let them be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They were adopted by the Senate by a unanimous vote.

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendments will be read.

The amendments were read at length.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order at this time to move an amendment to the Senate amendments?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the House determines by unanimous consent to proceed to consider the amendments. That is now the pending question. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BOUTELLE, Mr. PRICE, and others objected.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope that objection will not be insisted upon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Since objection is made I ask unanimous consent of the House to non-concur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

The bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BONDS OF EXECUTORS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7879) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EDWARD CORNING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1666) granting a pension to Edward Corning, amended by the House, and the House amendment concurred in with an amendment by the Senate.

Mr. MATSON. I ask that the Senate amendment to the House amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitation of the pension laws."

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to concur in that amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

VETO MESSAGE—JOSEPH ROMISER.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to present a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back the veto message of the President on the bill (H. R. 1059) to grant a pension to Joseph Romiser, accompanied by a report in writing. I move that it be printed in the RECORD and lie over.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill and report are as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the veto message of the President of the United States on the bill (H. R. 1059) to grant a pension to Joseph Romiser, submit the following report:

This bill was considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and favorably reported May 1, 1886, as follows:

"The facts of this case, which are completely substantiated, are briefly as follows:

"The claimant was a member of Capt. Frank Mason's company of volunteers, of Frostburg, Alleghany County, Maryland. This company of volunteers was not mustered into either the United States or State service. On the 19th of June, 1861, claimant was with said company when they were ordered to proceed to Cumberland, Md., to repel a threatened attack of the confederate forces. Upon the arrival of the company in Cumberland the men were ordered to uncap their muskets. While doing this duty a musket in the hands of Alpheus Beall was accidentally discharged, and a minie-ball, with which it was charged, struck claimant in the left side of the neck, coming out near the left eye, entirely destroying the sight of his eye, the hearing of his left ear, and the 'hinge of his jaws.'

"Dr. George B. Fundenburg testifies that he was one of the surgeons who professionally attended claimant. He found that a minie-ball had entered at the back part of the neck, passed along on the outside of the skull, under the ear, breaking the jaw at its ramus, and making its exit through the malar bone below and to the outer side of the eye of the same side. The wound was a dangerous one, but after a long sickness he recovered, but has lost the hearing of the injured ear and the sight of the eye. There is considerable deformity of the face caused by exfoliation of the bone.

"The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau because 'claimant was not in the military service of the United States.' The Committee on Invalid Pensions have heretofore uniformly declined to recommend the granting of a pension to soldiers not enrolled in the service of the United States or acting under the immediate orders of an officer in the United States service. They are fully satisfied that this rule is the proper one and that it should be rigidly adhered to; otherwise it will be readily seen that the door would be opened wide to a great number of claimants of whom it would be impossible to obtain any official record.

"It will be observed, however, that this man joined a military organization very early in the late war, and before the matter of enlistment and military organization was understood. June 19, 1861, he went with his company in obedience to orders to repel a threatened attack on Cumberland, and in the performance of this duty he received a serious wound, which imperiled his life at the time and has materially disabled him ever since.

"To properly understand the full bearing of this case it may be well to speculate as to what public opinion would have been and what would have been the result if, instead of springing to arms and going without hesitation when ordered to a threatened point, every volunteer would have hesitated or declined to march until he was regularly enlisted, enrolled, and mustered into the service of the United States.

"This case differs in all respects from those who, for one consideration or another and later on in the war, declined to enter the service of the United States, preferring organizations of a State or even local character.

"Your committee must content themselves with this brief statement of their views as to this particular case, and, by reason of the distinction attempted to be drawn between this and most other cases, they report the bill favorably and recommend its passage."

On the 5th of July, 1886, the bill, having passed both Houses and been presented to the President for his signature, was returned to the House with the following message:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 1059, entitled "An act to grant a pension to Joseph Romiser."

The Pension Bureau reports that the records of the office fail to show that an application has been filed in favor of this claimant, though it is stated in the report of the House committee that such a claim was made and rejected on the ground that the claimant was not, at the time of injury, in the service of the United States.

It certainly appears from the report of the committee that the beneficiary named in this bill was not in the service of the Government at such a time, and also that he had not been mustered into the service of any State military organization. It is stated that he belonged to Capt. Frank Mason's company of volunteers, of Frostburg, in the State of Maryland.

Whether this company was organized for the purpose of co-operating at any time with the Union or State forces is not alleged, and it may well have been existing merely for the purpose of neighborhood protection.

Such as it was, the company was ordered in June, 1861, to proceed to Cumberland to repel a threatened attack of confederate forces. Upon arriving at that place the men were ordered to uncap their muskets. In doing this, and through the negligence of another member of the company whose musket was discharged, the claimant was wounded.

It does not seem to me that the facts in this case, so far as they have been developed, justify the passage of this act.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

An act to grant a pension to Joseph Romiser.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Joseph Romiser, late of Capt. Frank Mason's company of Maryland volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act originated in the House of Representatives.
Attest: JNO. B. CLARK, JR., Clerk.

The files from the Pension Office from which the information was obtained upon which the report of the committee was based were returned to the Pension Office May 16, 1886, and were doubtless there when the veto message was written, but through the carelessness of some clerk were not presented to the President when he called for them, but on the contrary he was informed that "the records of the office fail to show that an application has been filed in favor of this claimant."

These files, which are now before your committee, show that the application was filed June 7, 1879, alleging:

"That at Cumberland, Md., June 19, 1861, claimant was shot through the left side of the neck, coming out at the corner of left eye, entirely destroying the sight of left eye and the hearing of the left ear, injuring the sight of the right eye and breaking the hinge of the jaw on the left side of the face by a musket-ball—gun being accidentally discharged in the hands of Private Alpheus Beall."

In support of the claim the following affidavits were filed:

STATE OF MARYLAND, Alleghany County ss, to wit:

On this 13th day of May, A. D. 1879, personally appeared before me, the subscriber, Theo. Luman, clerk of the circuit court in and for the State and county aforesaid, James M. That he was one of Captain Mason's volunteers for this occasion; that he heard the report of the gun, and was in a few minutes afterward with Romiser, and saw where Romiser had been shot; that he set up with Romiser the same night that he was shot; that our company returned to Frostburg the next day; that he of his own knowledge knows that the said Romiser was disabled for a long time.

That he was attended by Surgeon George B. Fundenburg, M. D., of Cumberland, Md., and the surgeon of the Eleventh Indiana Volunteer Infantry, whose name he does not recollect, said regiment being commanded by Col. Lewis Wallace; that he has read the petition and deposition of the said Joseph Romiser, and it is correct in every particular.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, Fayette County, to wit:

On the 7th day of June, A. D. 1879, personally appeared before me, the subscriber, J. M. Oglevee, prothonotary of the court of common pleas, a court of record in and for the State and county aforesaid, Alpheus Beall, who, having been first duly sworn according to law, did depose and say: That his name is Alpheus Beall; that his age is 38 years; that his present post-office address is Uniontown, Fayette County, in the State of Pennsylvania; that in June, A. Frank Mason's company of volunteers, who were not mustered into the United States or State service either, of Frostburg, Alleghany County, Maryland; that he was with said company when they were ordered to proceed to Cumberland, Md., on the 19th day of June, A. D. 1861; that said company were ordered to Cumberland, Md., to repel a threatened attack of the confederate forces.

That upon the company's arrival in Cumberland, Md., the men were ordered to take caps off of the muskets; that while doing this duty his (Beall's) musket, in his (Beall's) hands, was accidentally discharged, and the contents of his musket, being loaded with a minie ball, struck Private Joseph Romiser, of said company, in the left side of the neck, coming out near the left eye, entirely destroying the sight of Romiser's left eye and the hearing of the left ear, and breaking the hinge of the left jaw, thereby disabling said Romiser for many months and injuring him permanently for life; that it was purely an accident, and neither Romiser nor your deponent was to blame or were responsible for said accident.

That this deposition is made for the purpose of assisting said Romiser to procure a pension from the General Government, as your deponent believes him justly and equitably entitled to same; that this deponent is not interested directly or indirectly in the prosecution of the invalid-pension claim of said Joseph Romiser.

ALPHEUS BEALL.

STATE OF MARYLAND, Alleghany County, to wit:

On this 13th day of May, A. D. 1879, personally, before me the subscriber, Theodore Luman, clerk of the circuit court in and for the State and county aforesaid, Dr. George B. Fundenburg, M. D., a practicing physician, and a citizen of good repute of Cumberland, Md., who having been first duly sworn according to law did depose and say for himself: That his name is George B. D. 1861, at the request of the citizens of Cumberland, Md., to repel a threatened attack upon the city of Cumberland by the confederate forces.

That he recollects well the time, place, and general facts in connection with the shooting of Joseph Romiser through the left side of the neck and face by Alpheus Beall, as he, the said Fundenburg, was one of the physicians and surgeons that professionally attended the said Romiser; that the facts are as follows, to wit:

I found that a minie-ball had entered at the back part of the neck, passed along on the outer side of the skull, under the ear, breaking the jaw at its ramus, and making its exit through the malar bone, below and to the outer side of the eye of the same side. The wound was a dangerous one, but after a long sickness he recovered, but has lost the hearing of the injured ear and the sight of the eye. There is considerable deformity of the face, caused by exfoliation of bone. He has suffered ever since with frequent and protracted attacks of neuralgia, and there is danger that sympathetic ophthalmia may cause the loss of the remaining eye.

I have known Romiser for twenty years, and know him to be a man of excellent character and steady habits, and have always considered his case as one very strongly fortified and entitled to a favorable consideration.

Witness my hand and seal of the circuit court for Alleghany County, Maryland, the year and date first above written.

THEO. LUMAN,
Clerk of the Circuit Court for Alleghany County, Maryland.

It appears that the command of which claimant was a member was a provisional company at Frostburg, Md., under command of Capt. Frank Mason, organized for active service; that this company had marched to Cumberland, at the request of the corporate authorities of that place, to assist the Union forces there under the command of Col. Lew Wallace, of the Eleventh Indiana Volunteers, in resisting an attack of the confederate forces. This company had not been mustered into the military service of the United States.

Though it is shown that they were organized for the purpose of enlisting in the military service of the United States, that many of them did so enlist, and that this claimant had made all arrangements to enlist, and would doubtless have been regularly in the service in a few days had he not received the wound for which he now asks pension.

December 28, 1881, this claim was rejected in the Pension Office for the reason "not in military service of the United States. See 4693."

In an office letter the Pension Office set forth more fully the reasons of rejection as follows: The Adjutant-General, United States Army, reporting that no such organization was at the time mustered into the military service of the United States, this office was constrained under the provisions of law, especially paragraph 4693, Revised Statutes, to reject the claim, applicant having never been regularly enrolled and having failed to make and complete his application prior to date of limitation established by said section, namely, July 4, 1874. Paragraph 3, section 4693, Revised Statutes, in reciting the persons who shall be entitled to pensions, reads:

"Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval forces of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians, disabled in consequence of wounds or injury received in the line of duty in such temporary service."

The paragraph further provides that all such claims must be prosecuted to a successful issue before July 4, 1874. The failure of this claimant to make his application and prosecute his claim before the expiration of the limitation has deprived him of his pension for nearly twenty-five years. It seems to your committee that it is the duty of Congress to grant it to him now when he does ask for it. The precedents for this kind of legislation are very numerous, and extend back many years.

It has never been held an insuperable bar to a pension that a claimant had not been regularly mustered into the military service. The established requirement has been that it should be shown that the party was wounded or received an injury while rendering service in defense of his country in a legitimate way and under the direction of a proper officer. In the Forty-eighth Congress a pension was granted to a civilian who was a volunteer employé of the Sanitary Commission, and who lost his leg by the boat upon which he had charge of stores being fired upon by a rebel battery. A bill was introduced and has become a law during this Congress granting a pension to Albert L. Allen, an employé of the Quartermaster's Department, who was wounded in an action.

In the case of Mrs. Mooneyhan (H. R. 6801) a pension was granted on account of the death of her husband, though he died of fever the day before he was to have been mustered into service, and the bill was approved by the President.

A bill granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Poland, widow of Alexandria Poland, a citizen of Virginia, who was murdered by confederate soldiers because he had sold supplies to the Union forces and had fed Union soldiers, was also approved by the President. Quite a number of bills granting pensions to militiamen who received injuries or incurred disabilities have been approved, though no claim was made that they had been mustered into the United States service.

All of these bills met the hearty approval of your committee, for their rule has been to recommend the passage of bills granting pensions to persons who were wounded or injured while honestly defending the flag of the country, even though by some technicality their cases did not come within the scope of the general law. On the 15th of this month, by a vote of nearly three to one, this House passed a bill placing on the pension-roll the name of Catherine Waters, whose son, a steward on board of the steamer Benefit, was killed in an engagement with confederate forces.

The facts in this case, briefly stated, appear to be that an attack was threatened upon the Union forces at Cumberland; an appeal was made by the authorities to the local provisional company for help in defending the place. The company to which claimant belonged promptly responded. While this soldier was standing in the ranks of the Union forces with their guns loaded for the enemy he received a severe wound, destroying the sight of one eye and the hearing of one ear, terribly disfiguring him, and very narrowly escaping with his life.

The question presented to your committee is not whether, under existing law, he is entitled to a pension. If he was, there would be no occasion for a special enactment; but the point presented is, Did this man render such a service to the United States as to entitle him to receive from it a favorable consideration of his claim? Your committee believe he did. Voluntarily he responded to its call for aid, and in doing so received a terrible wound, from which he has ever since suffered, and the effects of which will follow him to his grave. Every true lover of his country, every man who desires to see justice done to those who freely suffered in behalf of that country will rejoice in the passage of this bill; and your committee frankly express the opinion that had it not been for the carelessness of the clerk in charge of the papers, and his failure to present them when they were called for by the President, there would have been no occasion to make this report.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of this bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I have never before asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a local bill; neither have I objected when unanimous consent was asked by a member for the consideration of a private or a local bill. There is now in the House a bill (S. 453) for the erection of a public building at Jacksonville, Fla. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration and that it be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office, custom-house, internal-revenue office, and other Government offices, at the city of Jacksonville, Fla. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $150,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Florida shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended the following amendment:

In line 12, after the word "dollars," insert the following:

"Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill as amended to be read a third time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Florida whether the building to be erected is necessary for the holding of a United States court?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana I will make this statement: that Jacksonville is the largest post-office in the State; that it has a United States district and circuit court; that it has the third largest custom-house in the State, and an internal-revenue office.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In listening to the reading of the bill I did not hear it stated that it was for the purpose of holding a United States court. I remember that a bill recently passed for the erection of a public building in the city of Dayton, Ohio, was objected to, not because Dayton was not a large city, but because a building was not necessary for a United States court.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. There is necessity for a United States court-house.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I have no objection.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. There should have been a court-house in the city of Jacksonville long since, but the demand for a public building is not based on the necessity for a court-house alone. As has been stated, the Government requires accommodations for its other officers in that city. There is the largest post-office in the State, the distributing office for a large part of the State, from which a population of twenty-one or two thousand people directly receive their mail. During the winter months it is safe to say that thirty or forty thousand citizens and visitors receive their mail from that office. The rent paid for what I consider inadequate quarters for such an office is $2,600 per year.

In addition to the court and the post-office there yet remain the custom-house and internal-revenue office. I had the figures giving the rents paid for all the offices mentioned, but have mislaid them, and will not delay the proceedings of the House, knowing the difficulties of getting any bill considered even at this time. As is well known, Jacksonville is the leading commercial city of the State, and is likely to continue to be. It is the gateway through which the great tourist-travel annually reaches all sections of Florida.

It is situated upon the Saint John's River, which is navigable for large steamers 211 miles and for a smaller class of boats 435 miles. Its tributaries are navigable 450 miles, making a total of over 850 miles of navigable water, upon which float over one hundred steamers, with an aggregate tonnage of over 9,000 tons.

The city has also about, I believe, 1,000 miles of railroad feeders now in operation and more under construction.

The records of the various offices are of great importance, especially those of the court.

A great many of the old Spanish records or transcripts thereof are in the custody of the clerk of the court, and in case of fire, while they might not be destroyed, they would undoubtedly be materially injured.

The necessity for this building presents a strong case for the consideration of the House. While I do not think the amount carried by this bill is sufficient to provide such a structure as will be required, it will bring the matter prominently before the authorities. When the architect finds officially just what the needs of the Government are he will then make specific recommendations through the proper channels, and I doubt not they will receive proper consideration here at some future time.

It is probably proper to remark that this and even a larger appropriation is not asked just to secure an expenditure of the public money. It is not sought to procure the erection of any small building with expensive ornamentation, but the purpose is to erect a substantial building large enough for the Government offices.

There is still another consideration. If the Government had placed a building in Jacksonville five or six years ago it would have been a good investment. And if the sum of $200,000 shall be expended in that behalf even now, it will be found that the Government will be the real beneficiary of such expenditure; for in less than five years the rents for adequate offices will exceed the interest on $200,000 at 4 per cent.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOUGHERTY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CREDIT TO STATE OF KANSAS.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2332) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the State of Kansas with certain sums of money on its ordnance account with the General Government, and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the State of Kansas to be credited on its ordnance account with the General Government with the sum of $24,448.50, for ordnance and ordnance stores drawn by the State of Kansas to aid the General Government in the protection of said State against Indian invasion and depredations.

Mr. RYAN. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Commitee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. CUTCHEON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2332) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the State of Kansas with certain sums of money on its ordnance account with the General Government, submit the following report:

The committee have already favorably reported the House bill of the same purport, which is now upon the Calendar. The committee, for the reasons given in that report, and in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance and Secretary of War, report back the Senate bill and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not observe any reason stated in the report for the passage of this bill. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] make a statement? The report does not.

Mr. RYAN. The bill has been approved by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Ordnance. It is to give the State of Kansas credit for arms that were issued for the protection of the frontier in the Indian wars of 1868 and 1874. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires to have read the report on the House bill, it gives all the reasons.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREENSBOROUGH, N. C.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9438) appropriating money for the completion of the public building at Greensborough, N. C., and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $9,000 be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the public building at Greensborough, N. C.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMILE GUERIN AND CHERI P. MAJOR.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6330) to confirm to Emile Guerin and Cheri P. Major title to certain lands, and that the same be now considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. After that I will insist on the regular order.

The bill was read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the consideration of the bill unless we can have the report read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the report will be read subject to the right to object.

The report was read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Regular order.

MRS. MARIA HUNTER.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD and lie over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7167) for the relief of Mrs. Maria Hunter, with the President's objection, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The following is the report originally submitted in this case:

[House Report No. 1522, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The claimant is the widow of the late Maj. Gen. David Hunter, who died on the 2d day of February, 1886. General David Hunter was one of the most distinguished soldiers of the late war, as his military record, herewith attached and made part of this report, shows:

R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

The following is the message of the President returning the bill without his approval:

To the House of Representatives:

I hereby return without approval House bill No. 7167, entitled "An act for the relief of Mrs. Maria Hunter."

The beneficiary named in this bill, to whom it is therein proposed to grant a pension at the rate of $50 a month, on the 23d day of March, 1886, filed her application for a pension in the Pension Bureau, where it is still pending undetermined.

Although the deceased soldier held a high rank, I have no doubt his widow will receive ample justice through the instrumentality organized for the purpose of dispensing the nation's grateful acknowledgment of military service in its defense.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 23, 1886.

[H. R. 7167. Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

An act for the relief of Mrs. Maria Hunter.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maria Hunter, widow of David Hunter, late colonel of the Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry and major-general of United States volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

The effect of this bill would be to give the beneficiary a pension of $20 per month more than that given by the general law. In view of the fact that the widows of officers under the law receive much larger pensions than the widows of soldiers, and in view of the further fact that it is not alleged or claimed that this widow needs any increase of her pension, and in view of the further fact that we have barely tolerated the increase of the pensions of the widows of officers, we therefore recommend that the objection of the President be sustained, and that the bill do not pass.

It is true, as stated by the President, that the beneficiary named in this bill had a claim pending in the Pension Office at the time of the passage of the bill, and that since then, as we are informed, she has been granted by said office the full pension allowed by law as the widow of a major-general.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

In view of the fact that the present and previous Congresses have invariably granted a pension of $50 per month to widows of officers holding a similar rank to that held by General Hunter at the time of his death, and as the President has at the present session of Congress approved (by signing) a number of bills of this character, and that of Mrs. General Hancock, granting her a pension of $2,000 per annum, we can see no reason why the case of Mrs. Hunter, the widow of a gallant and meritorious officer who served his country faithfully and well from 1823 to the close of our late civil war, should be made an exception, and therefore recommend that the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MATSON. I present also the views of the minority upon the veto message of the President on the bill (H. R. 6192), which I ask to have printed in the RECORD with the report of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The objection of the President to this bill is that it is not stated how the defective hearing of the soldier contributed to his death, or, to state it more explicitly, it is not shown or pretended that if he had heard the warning from the shore he could have saved himself.

We agree with the President, and believe that he must, from the very circumstances stated, have been apprised of the fact that the boat was sinking as soon as the person who stood upon the shore, and that the failure to hear the warning had nothing to do with his death.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Unless the Committee on Ways and Means desire to present some matter, the regular order is the completion of the bill which was under consideration when the House adjourned yesterday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that we shall go on and finish the bill, so as to have a conference as soon as possible.

ALLEGED FRAUD ON THE TREASURY.

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department on a resolution in reference to an alleged fraud on the revenue by Richard T. Lancaster. The report is the unanimous report of the committee. I ask for its present consideration, and on that I call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that if this is a matter of controversy my colleague will withhold his report for the present.

Mr. LOWRY. It is not. It is merely a request for information. It is the matter which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] has been pressing so persistently, and I desire to have it acted upon at the earliest possible moment. It merely calls for information from the Treasury Department.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the report be read.

[By accident a wrong paper was printed in the daily RECORD, and in the permanent RECORD the proper paper has been inserted, as follows:]

Mr. LOWRY, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, submitted the following as a substitute for Miscellaneous Document 350:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to which was referred the following preamble and resolution of inquiry relative to an alleged fraud on the revenue by Richard D. Lancaster—

"Whereas heretofore the United States recovered a judgment for $25,000 against Richard D. Lancaster in the circuit court for the eastern district of Missouri; and

"Whereas the said Lancaster a short time prior to said judgment conveyed all his property to his brother-in-law and his business partner and that partner's brother, and thereupon procured a settlement with the United States for the sum of $500, and thereupon received back his said property from the temporary holders thereof; and

"Whereas the said transfers are fraudulent upon their face, and if merely colorable, the affidavit filed by the said Lancaster alleging his total insolvency was false, and the said settlement was procured by fraud, conspiracy, and perjury on the part of said Lancaster; and

"Whereas in that case the said fraudulent settlement can and should be set aside, and the entire amount of said debt can and should be recovered to the use of the United States; and

"Whereas the United States district attorney of the eastern district of Missouri has been lately investigating, under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, the said frauds committed by said R. D. Lancaster upon the revenue of the United States; and

"Whereas he discovered such evidence of fraud as justified him in demanding power to put the parties implicated under oath, and therefore applied to the Department for the detail of a clerk for that purpose under section 183 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

"'Any officer or clerk of any of the Departments lawfully detailed to investigate frauds on, or attempts to defraud, the Government, or any irregularity or misconduct of any officer or agent of the United States, shall have authority to administer an oath to any witness attending to testify or depose in the course of such investigation.'

"And whereas, for reasons which can only be surmised, this demand was refused:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a statement of what reasons, of a public nature, induced him to refuse, on the demand of the district attorney, the usual and necessary means provided by statute for the investigation of frauds upon the revenue laws, including the detail of a clerk requested by him; and also that the Secretary of the Treasury transmit to the House copies of all papers relating to the investigation in question, and the correspondence of the Department with the district attorney at Saint Louis.

"And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to advise this House what reasons, of a public nature, at present exist why the Treasury Department should not make a thorough examination, under oath, of the parties implicated in and having knowledge of the subject-matter of said investigation"— having had the same under consideration, report the same back with a substitute therefor, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House the reason why a detail of a clerk, with power to administer oaths, as seems to be provided for in section 183, Revised Statutes of the United States, was not made upon the application therefor by the United States district attorney, William H. Bliss, esq., for the eastern district of Missouri, in a telegram dated Saint Louis, Mo., May 28, 1886, relating to proposed inquiry into the alleged fraudulent settlement of Richard D. Lancaster, bondsman of John Busby, distiller, with the United States Government; and also, if there be reasons for not doing so, why said detail can not be made at this time to investigate said settlement of Lancaster, as well as the settlement made at the same time with other sureties on the bond of said Busby, namely, John Mehan and Jeremiah Ryan; and the Secretary is requested to transmit with his reply copies of all papers and correspondence relating to said matter."

The previous question was ordered upon the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate—fifteen minutes in support of the resolution and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOWRY. I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. There is no time in support of the resolution except that which belongs to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY].

Mr. BLAND. Let us have a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to occupy the time if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] yields to him.

Mr. LOWRY. I yield three minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is all I want. I only desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the officer is concerned whose name is connected with this resolution he has at all times courted the fullest investigation, and that so far as this transaction is concerned I do not believe, and the people of Saint Louis do not believe, that there was any deliberate intentional fraud in connection with his compromising that suit. I think it but just to an officer of the Government to make that statement, and in justice to him I wish to say further that he notified the United States attorney at Saint Louis that he desired the fullest investigation of this matter, and that the necessity for this resolution does not arise from any unwillingness on his part to have an investigation of his conduct in the matter. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, the very purpose of adopting this resolution is to afford the fullest opportunity for inquiry and investigation of this matter, so as to ascertain whether any fraud has been perpetrated upon the revenue by the party accused. An additional object, which I hope will be accomplished to the fullest extent, is to throw oil upon the troubled waters of Saint Louis politics. [Laughter.] I now insist upon the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been already ordered by the House.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LOWRY. How much time does the gentleman from Missouri desire?

Mr. GLOVER. Only a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that while the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] controls the time in favor of the report there are also fifteen minutes allowed for debate in opposition to it.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, am I entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the floor if he desires to oppose the resolution.

Mr. GLOVER. I do not.

Mr. LOWRY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, this matter is now in such a shape that I do not think present discussion of it would be profitable. I therefore intend to confine my remarks to an answer to the remark made by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL]. So far is it from being the fact that the United States officer referred to has been willing that an investigation of a thorough kind should be had, that the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Missouri testified before the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department that he had endeavored to get this official to make an affidavit purging himself of the fraud, and that the official had declined to do so for reasons which this House may well surmise. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute reported by the committee, it was agreed to.

The original resolution as amended by the adoption of the substitute was then agreed to.

Mr. LOWRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8974) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Amendment numbered 28 (on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. REAGAN) was read, as follows:

After the words "two chief pages," in line 326, insert "A. H. Pickens and H. T. Lyle."

The SPEAKER. On concurring in this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report of the committee is in favor of concurrence, I believe.

The SPEAKER. This amendment is reported from the Committee of the Whole with a recommendation that it be concurred in. The vote will now be taken on concurring.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 111, not voting 76; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. WADSWORTH stated that his colleague [Mr. TAULBEE] was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. STORM moved by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. JAMES objected.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Until further notice:

Mr. DAWSON with Mr. RANNEY.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. PHELPS.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. OWEN.

Mr. ROGERS with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. BARBOUR with Mr. LIBBEY.

Mr. REESE with Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. ARNOT with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. LANDES with Mr. HANBACK.

Mr. COX with Mr. O'DONNELL.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. VAN SCHAICK.

Mr. HEARD with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. VIELE with Mr. CASWELL.

For this vote:

Mr. HAYDEN with Mr. DARGAN.

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska.

For this day:

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. SAWYER.

Mr. BEACH with Mr. GALLINGER.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. GROSVENOR.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CANNON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 8973) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The next question on which a separate vote was asked was the one hundred and nineteenth amendment; which was read, as follows:

Insert after the appropriations for "Office of Publication of Records of the Rebellion" the following:

"And hereafter the records prepared for publication under this appropriation shall contain only the records of the war of the rebellion covering contemporaneous events, arranged chronologically, according to the provisions of the act of June 23, 1874, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875. And the evidence taken by the court-martial on the trial of Fitz-John Porter, together with the report thereon by Judge Holt to President Lincoln, shall be printed in connection with matter already printed concerning the proceedings of said court-martial."

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union recommend concurrence in that amendment with an amendment as follows.

The Clerk read as follows:

Also any papers on behalf of the defense in said court-martial directly connected with the proceedings of the same, and contemporaneous therewith, that have not been already published in any previous volume of said records.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to move to non-concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The first proposition to be voted on is the recommendation of the committee to concur with an amendment. If that is refused, the Chair thinks the amendment is before the House to concur or non-concur.

Mr. STEELE. The motion to concur with an amendment is first in order, then?

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition before the House.

Mr. STEELE. I do not wish to concur.

The SPEAKER. The first proposition is on the recommendation of the committee to concur with an amendment. If that is not concurred in, then the amendment of the Senate will be before the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 81.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in with an amendment.

The next question on which a separate vote was asked was the one hundred and sixty-third amendment; which was read, as follows:

In line 26 strike out "four" and insert "five;" so it will read:
"For compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions, $5,000."

The SPEAKER. The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. PRICE. I move the House non-concur.

The SPEAKER. Refusal to concur is equivalent to non-concurrence. The motion to concur has priority over a motion to non-concur.

Mr. PRICE. I hope the House will non-concur. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 15.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next question on which a separate vote was asked was the amendment numbered 179; which was read, as follows:

To enable the Commissioner of Labor to collect and report to Congress the statistics of and relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and Territories and in the District of Columbia, $10,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I ask concurrence. I regard it as one of the most enlightened provisions in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on all the amendments, and a refusal to concur is equivalent to non-concurrence.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It is not in order to say anything——

Mr. HOLMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 59.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. PRICE. Oh, yes.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. This is an important amendment, one of the most important in this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 33 (more than one-fifth) voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 108, not voting, 79; as follows:

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I object.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. NORWOOD with Mr. O'DONNELL, until further notice.

Mr. WARD, of Indiana, with Mr. HAYDEN, for the rest of this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. CABELL, and Mr. CANNON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the remainder of the day is set apart for the consideration of such measures as may be presented by the Committee on Ways and Means, not to include bills raising revenue.

Mr. STEELE. If the committee does not desire to call up any bills I have one——

Mr. SPRINGER. They do desire to call up bills.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill No. 7815, to which I think there will be no disagreement.

Mr. BLAND. I object.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the regular order.

PACKING AND SELLING CUT TOBACCO.

Mr. MORRISON. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 8738) to so further amend section 3362 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, and section 3363, as makes a distinction in the mode of packing and selling cut tobacco, and yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] who reported the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a report accompanying the bill which explains fully its purposes. This has the indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and as far as ascertained the indorsement of every manufacturer and dealer. There seems to be no objection to the passage of the bill, and I ask that it be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3362 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 14 of the act approved the 1st day of March, 1879, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to internal revenue," be still further amended by striking out all after the number and substituting the following:

"All manufactured tobacco shall be put up and prepared by the manufacturer for sale, or removal for sale or consumption, in packages of the following description, and in no other manner:

"All snuff in packages containing ¼, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, and 16 ounces, or in bladders and in jars containing not exceeding 20 pounds.

"All cut and granulated tobacco, all refuse scraps, clippings, cuttings, shorts, and sweepings of tobacco in packages containing 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, and 16 ounces each, except, at the option of the manufacturer, cut tobacco may be put up in bulk packages containing 10 pounds each.

"All cavendish, plug, and twist tobacco in packages not exceeding 200 pounds net weight.

"And every such package shall have printed or marked thereon the manufacturer's name and place of manufacture, the registered number of the manufactory, and the gross weight, the tare, and the net weight of the tobacco in each package: Provided, That these limitations and descriptions of packages shall not apply to tobacco and snuff transported in bond for exportation and actually exported: And provided further, That fine-cut shorts, refuse scraps, clippings, cuttings, and sweepings of tobacco may be sold in bulk as material, and without the payment of tax, by one manufacturer directly to another manufacturer, or for export, under such restrictions, rules, and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe: And provided further, That wood, metal, paper, or other materials may be used, separately or in combination, for packing tobacco, snuff, and cigars, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may establish."

And that section 3363 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by striking out all after the number and substituting the following:

"No manufactured tobacco shall be sold or offered for sale unless put up in packages and stamped as prescribed in this chapter, except at retail by retail dealers from packages stamped as provided in this chapter; and every person who sells or offers for sale any snuff, of any kind of manufactured tobacco, not so put up in packages and stamped, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years."

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the bill that it does not come within the meaning of the order. That order states specifically that it shall not include revenue bills.

Mr. RANDALL. This does not affect the revenue.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It does not raise revenue.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill in none of its provisions affects the revenues of the Government. The tax remains upon the tobacco precisely the same whether it be put up in 2-ounce packages or in 10-pound packages.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that the bill affects the revenue.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw the point.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask whether this bill is now upon its passage?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir; it is presented for that purpose.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. As I understand it, it makes a radical change in the mode of putting up manufactured tobacco.

Mr. HARRIS. Putting up cut tobacco.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, cut tobacco. I would like to ask a question in reference to this. The gentleman must know, if the House will indulge me a moment, that this change may involve a very great expense to the different manufacturers throughout the country. I understand the bill does not permit tobacco to be put up except as prescribed by this bill. Am I right?

Mr. HARRIS. No, sir; the law as it now exists requires that this particular article of cut tobacco——

Mr. STEELE. I desire to renew the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this bill does affect the revenue in this: it provides that the sweepings, &c., shall be free of duty.

The SPEAKER. That is the law now.

Mr. STEELE. But it provides that they may be sold without the payment of duties.

The SPEAKER. They may be sold by one manufacturer to another manufacturer for export purposes without tax. The law as laid down in section 1362 of the Revised Statutes already permits that.

Mr. STEELE. If it can be done already why is it in this bill?

Mr. HARRIS. The tax remains precisely the same at 80 cents a pound, and it will be 80 cents a pound whether this tobacco is put up in 1-ounce packages or 10-pound cans. The reason this provision is incorporated in the bill is for the purpose of identifying the different characters of tobacco. At present great difficulty exists in identifying the different kinds of tobacco which are put up in this form.

Another reason is, that owing to the climatic influences tobacco put up in small packages can not be kept safe and sound; at this time there is a suit growing out of the mode of packing tobacco against the Government in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. STEELE. That does not meet my point.

Mr. HARRIS. The revenues are not affected, because the tax, 80 cents a pound, remains the same. I will state further that it appears from a very voluminous correspondence received from dealers and manufacturers throughout the States in which this tobacco is put up there is no objection to this legislation on their part, but a universal desire that in their interest and in the interest of the Government it should be passed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I know a large trade is built up by divers manufacturers in which tobacco is called for by name, or reference to size or form of package. And recently it has come under my observation that the trade has been seriously injured by changes ordered by the Internal Revenue Department, of course within the scope of their jurisdiction. Now, if this is a radical change it may destroy the trade of one firm in this locality and another in that, and as I represent a large manufacturing locality I wish to understand whether it will do that or not.

Mr. HARRIS. It will not, and by way of meeting all the objections that may be entertained by members I will have a letter read from the Internal Revenue Office, and also a letter representing the views of dealers and manufacturers.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, May 4, 1886.

SIR: For six years, from September 1, 1862, to November 23, 1868, the taxes imposed upon tobacco, snuff, and cigars were collected on assessments, determined by the several assessors of the country. The conditions under which the tax accrued differed from those under the present law. Time was allowed after sale or removal for sale or consumption for the payment of tax, ranging from thirty to sixty days. And under the law manufacturers were allowed to remove their goods to agents, and the tax was not assessed until such agents reported the sale of the goods. The law did not define the kind or the capacity of the packages in which all goods should be packed by the manufacturer.

Under the law great difficulties were experienced in making collections of the taxes imposed, and great opportunities were afforded for fraud.

So thoroughly satisfied were Congress, revenue officers, and honest manufacturers of the necessity of a change in the mode of collecting taxes on these articles that during the session of 1867–'68 the matter was thoroughly canvassed, and, on the 20th of July, 1868, the law was adopted which has been in force since that date with only slight modifications, made from time to time, as experience seemed to render advisable.

This law clearly and explicitly provides the manner in which all tobacco, snuff, and cigars shall be packed, adopting the principle that, so far as practicable, tobacco must be put up in packages suitable for the retail trade, not to exceed in any case 16 ounces each, and that a stamp indicating the payment of the tax must be affixed to each such package.

The exceptions were intended to cover tobaccos ordinarily classed as chewing tobacco. They were cavendish, plug, and twist, and a class of tobacco known at the time as fine-cut chewing. In the former case, the package was limited to 200 pounds. In the latter case, option was given to the manufacturer to pack in the small retail packages or in bulk packages containing definite quantities, to wit: 10, 20, 40, and 60 pounds each.

Granulated tobacco, without exception, so far as this office is aware, is used exclusively for smoking; cavendish, plug, and twist, generally as chewing; cut tobacco may be, and is, used for either chewing or smoking, but generally for smoking.

Practically, there is no difficulty found, therefore, in classifying cavendish, plug, twist, and granulated tobacco. But great difficulties have been and are found in satisfactorily classifying cut tobacco.

The law does not define in any way "fine-cut chewing tobacco."

The 10-pound package was found to be a very convenient and a much less expensive mode of packing cut tobacco than the smaller packages. And for these reasons manufacturers have endeavored to force upon the market this class of tobacco whether really entitled to be thus packed or not.

Frequently tobacco has been cut with a view of producing an article equally well fitted for smoking or chewing purposes. Other manufacturers have prepared an article which, in the material used—largely sugar, licorice, and other sweetening materials—is only fitted for chewing, and can not well be smoked. Other manufacturers prepare an article without the use of sweetening materials to any extent, which is not suited for use as chewing tobacco, and generally used for smoking purposes.

These modes of manufacture open a wide field for difference of opinions, and this office has found it utterly impossible to reconcile these differences under the law as it now exists.

For this reason I have thought proper to recommend a change in the mode of packing cut tobacco in bulk, allowing all cut tobacco to be thus packed, but confining the size of the package to 10 pounds each. This change, if adopted, will allow manufacturers in every part of the country the same privilege of packing, and the same privilege of selling their cut tobacco wherever they can find purchasers, and will not very greatly facilitate the reuse of packages without the payment of the tax.

Inclosed please find draught of a bill providing for such a change in the mode of packing cut tobacco as is herein recommended.

I remain, sir, yours, very respectfully,

I. KIMBALL,
Head of the Tobacco Division.

Hon. JOSEPH S. MILLER,
Commissioner, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HARRIS. I now desire to have read the views of the manufacturers regarding this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 12, 1886.

SIR: In reference to House bill 8738, which your committee has already very carefully and favorably considered, allow me to say in answer to your question of this morning that the reasons why we as manufacturers are desirous of having the same passed are so many and so nearly the same as those advanced by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as well as by the Secretary of the Treasury, namely, to prevent further complications and useless and expensive litigation, that it seems unnecessary for me to repeat the same in detail. I shall, therefore, mention only the two principal reasons, which you will, I think, find sufficiently important. You can readily see what the difference in the cost of material and labor would be between putting up a 10-pound bucket of tobacco in one package and putting the same amount in 2-ounce papers, or eighty different packages, each stamped and labeled, which additional cost only falls on the manufacturers, while the revenue to the Government is the same, 80 cents, or 8 cents per pound.

Another fatal objection to the present style of packing in small papers, especially in our section, is the climatic influences, which make it almost impossible to prevent tobacco (prepared) from spoiling, no matter how carefully manipulated, whereas by packing it in 10-pound bulk we preserve both the moisture and flavor intact.

You must remember that there are comparatively very few manufacturers of this particular kind of fine-cut tobacco, and they are situated in New York, Detroit, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and New Orleans only. In the latter city there are eight small factories that make a peculiar kind of tobacco, and which is all sold in Louisiana, Southern Texas, and Southern Alabama, and used for both chewing and smoking purposes, as the taste of the consumer may fancy. The present law regulating the manner of packing fine-cut chewing and smoking tobacco was enacted in 1868, when the tax was 40 cents per pound; and while the tax has been gradually reduced to 8 cents and the incentive for fraud lessened in proportion, the mode of packing remains unchanged, which we think is an unnecessary hardship. After the payment of the tax we believe that in fact we should be permitted to pack our goods in whatever sized packages we please, as manufacturers of chewing goods are allowed to do. This, however, we do not ask, since the present bill affords us so much better facilities than we have heretofore enjoyed. Since my arrival in Washington I am informed by the chief of the Department, who framed this bill, or rather who suggested this slight amendment, that it meets with the universal approval of the manufacturers and dealers all over the country, and as it affects particularly the New Orleans manufacturers (and there are no others south of Cincinnati or Saint Louis), at a meeting held in New Orleans a few days ago I was selected to come before you and urge the passage of this bill before the adjournment of Congress. This bill is not for the benefit of any one section, but operates alike on all manufacturers in the United States, and is approved by all of them. It meets the sanction and hearty indorsement of the Revenue Department, and will undoubtedly largely increase the receipts from this source.

It removes an obstacle that has stood too long in the way of the honest taxpayer, and relieves the Government of an embarrassment that should not exist for the good of the service.

Trusting that your committee in their wisdom will see the necessity for immediate action in the premises,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. CURTIS,
For New Orleans Manufacturers.

Hon. HENRY R. HARRIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I only desired to be well assured that this bill had not lurking in it anywhere what would destroy an established trade. I wanted to be assured that it did not for the sake of a doubtful good accomplish a greater evil, that it might not be doing an injury to some industry in some part of the country. But after what has been read I do not know that there is any objection to it. Since it appears that the manufacturers of cut tobacco all favor it, and it has the approval of the Internal Revenue Department——

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HARRIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF TOBACCO, ETC.

Mr. MORRISON. I call up now from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 8585) to provide for the inspection of tobacco, cigars, and snuff, and to repeal section 3151 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars may be removed for export to a foreign country without payment of tax, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe: Provided, That the work of examining the tobacco, snuff, and cigars at the factory, and of affixing the export stamps, marks, and brands, shall be performed by the collector of internal revenue, or by one of his deputies, without expense to the manufacturer of such tobacco, snuff, or cigars.

SEC. 2. That section 3151 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect on the first day of the second calendar month succeeding that in which it is approved.

The Committee on Ways and Means recommended the following amendment:

Strike out the following: "That manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars may be removed for export to a foreign country without payment of tax, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe: Provided, That the work of examining the tobacco, snuff, and cigars at the factory, and of affixing the export stamps, marks, and brands, shall be performed by the collector of internal revenue, or by one of his deputies, without expense to the manufacturer of such tobacco, snuff, or cigars;" and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"That manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars may be removed for export to a foreign country without payment of tax, under such regulations, and the making of such entries, and the filing of such bonds and bills of lading as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Unless some explanation is desired I will move the previous question.

Mr. MCADOO. I should like the gentleman to give some explanation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Under the present law there are inspectors of tobacco who see that certain stamps are affixed, which stamps have to be canceled in a certain way on proof to be made. This bill repeals that law, and allows the Secretary of the Treasury to permit such things to be done under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point of order that this is a measure raising revenue. Section 3151 of the Revised Statutes provides in the case of the export of tobaccos referred to in this bill certain fees shall be paid by the exporter. It is proposed by this bill to repeal that section.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That is so. It repeals, however, the duties which those inspectors have to perform and relieves the exporters or manufacturers of tobacco of the payment of some $14,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does it diminish the revenue?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It does not diminish the revenue because it repeals certain duties the inspectors have to perform.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression, although he has not had an opportunity of examining the statutes carefully, that these fees paid to inspectors do not come into the revenue but go to the inspectors.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. These fees are paid by tobacco manufacturers or exporters to the inspectors and form no part of the revenue. Nor does the removal of these fees add anything to the burdens of the revenue. The bill simply removes from the inspectors the discharge of the duties and the fees.

Mr. HEPBURN. Section 3151 provides as follows:

There shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in every collection district where they may be necessary, one or more inspectors of tobacco and cigars, who shall take an oath faithfully to perform their duties in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, and shall be entitled to receive such fees as he may prescribe, to be paid by the owner or manufacturer of the articles inspected.

That is only a portion of the salary of the officer, and in that way it becomes a part of the revenue of the country, so far as the payment of his salary is concerned.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. But this bill repeals that section, and therefore repeals the power to appoint those inspectors, and of course if the power to appoint the inspectors be repealed there will be no burden upon the revenue to pay their compensation. Anyhow, the inspector was not paid by the Government; his payment was a burden imposed on the manufacturer of the tobacco, and the revenue will be neither added to nor lessened whether the law remain as it is now or this act be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order not well taken, because it appears from the section itself that it is the inspector who is entitled to these fees, not the Government; and this bill proposes to abolish the office of the inspector, and of course to abolish the fees out of which they now receive their compensation. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the previous question on the amendment and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I now call up from the House Calendar the bill H. R. 3289.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 5 of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that it shall read as follows, namely:

"SEC. 5. That merchandise transported under the provisions of this act shall be conveyed in cars, vessels, or vehicles securely fastened with locks or seals, under the exclusive control of the officers of the customs; and merchandise may also be transported under the provisions of this act by express companies on passenger trains, in safes, 'pouches,' and trunks, which shall be of such size, character, and description and secured in such manner as shall be from time to time prescribed by the Secretary; and in cases where merchandise shall be imported in boxes or packages too large to be included within the safes, trunks, or 'pouches' as prescribed, such merchandise may be transported under the provisions of this act by such express companies, 'corded and sealed,' in such manner as shall from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; 'and passengers' baggage and effects arriving at any of the ports specified in section 1 of this act, which shall appear by the manifest of the importing vessel, or other satisfactory evidence, to be destined to any of the ports specified in the seventh section, may also be transported by express companies under the provisions of this act to any of the ports specified in the seventh section thereof, in such manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe;' and merchandise such as pig-iron, spiegel-iron, scrap-iron, iron ore, railroad-iron, and similar articles commonly transported upon platform or flat cars may be transported under the provisions of this act upon such platform or flat cars; and the weight of such merchandise so transported shall be ascertained in all cases before shipment, and ordinary railroad scales may be used for such purposes; and inspectors shall be stationed at proper points along the designated routes, or upon any car, vessel, vehicle, or train, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and at the expense of the companies, respectively. Such merchandise shall not be unladen or transshipped between the ports of first arrival and final destination, unless authorized by the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury in cases which may arise from a difference in the gauge of railroads, or 'where the route is bonded for both land and water carriage,' or from accidents, or from legal intervention, or when, by reason of the length of the route, the cars, after due inspection by customs officers, shall be considered unsafe or unsuitable to proceed further, or from low water, ice, or other unavoidable obstruction to navigation; and in no case shall there be permitted any breaking of the original paekages of such merchandise."

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, this bill alters the existing law in very few particulars. It allows goods to be transported in pouches, as well as in trunks. It allows packages to be corded and sealed. It also extends the operation of the existing law to passengers' luggage. It also allows transportation to be made in bond when land and water routes are bonded together, which is not now allowed by law. The bill is approved by the Treasury Department, was passed by the last House under a unanimous report from the committee, but did not reach the Senate in time for action, and is now unanimously reported by the committee. Unless further explanation be desired I ask the previous question.

The committee recommend an amendment, inserting after the words

"specified in one section of this act," in line 24, section 5, the following:

Which shall appear by the manifest of the importing vessel, or other satisfactory evidence, to be destined to any of the ports specified in the seventh section.

The previous question was ordered upon the amendment reported by the committee, and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEWITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the House Calendar House bill 7860, and I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, be, and the same are hereby, so amended as to allow merchandise liable to specific rates of duty only to be entered for immediate transportation without appraisement to any of the ports mentioned in the seventh section of said act, although the same may not appear by the invoice, bill of lading, or manifest of the importing vessel to be consigned to or destined for either of said ports, when the consignee at the port of first arrival shall make written application therefor to the collector, giving the name of the person at the port or destination to whom he desires the merchandise to be consigned; and whenever such application and entry shall be made, the original invoice presented by the consignee at the port of first arrival shall be forwarded, with a copy of the transportation entry, to the collector at the port of destination; and a copy of such invoice shall be retained on file at the port of first arrival. The original invoice so forwarded shall be treated as the only invoice of the merchandise upon which entry shall be made at the port of destination, and the person making such entry shall be held responsible for the statements contained therein in the same manner as if the merchandise had been originally consigned to him: Provided, however, That the privileges herein conferred shall not extend to any merchandise the duties upon which, or any portion thereof, depend upon the value of such merchandise: And provided further, That such privilege shall be granted only in cases where no part of the merchandise shall have been landed prior to entry for immediate transportation as aforesaid.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill I think explains itself. Its provisions are very simple. They are, to extend the provisions of the immediate transportation law to merchandise upon which duties are specific and which therefore requires no appraisement.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Unless some further information be desired in regard to it I will call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEES OF INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTORS.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the bill H. R. 8598, and that the bill be put upon its passage. The bill relates to the fees of collectors who have been lately decided by the court to be entitled to certain commissions as well as to their salaries. It has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Ways and Means. We have provided for the current year in the appropriation bill just passed, and we propose by this bill to correct the law permanently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3314 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 5 of the act approved the 1st day of March, 1879, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to internal revenue," and by section 16 of the act approved the 28th day of May, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to internal revenue," be still further amended by striking out all after the number and substituting the following:

"The books of tax-paid stamps issued to any collector shall be charged to his account at the full value of the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons contained in said books; and every collector shall make a monthly return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of all tax-paid stamps issued by him to be affixed to any cask or package containing distilled spirits on which the tax has been paid, and account for the amount of the tax collected, and shall return to the Commissioner each book of marginal stubs whenever and as soon as the stamps contained in the book when issued to him have been used. All stamps relating to distilled spirits, other than the tax-paid stamps, shall be charged to collectors; and the books containing such stamps may be intrusted by any collector to the gauger of the district, who shall make a daily report to the collector of all such stamps used by him and for whom used; and when all the stamps contained in any such book have been issued, the gauger of the district shall return the book to the collector, with all the marginal stubs therein: Provided, That all export stamps issued to collectors shall be charged to them as representing the value of 10 cents for each stamp, and they shall collect the amount due for such stamps at the rate of 10 cents for each stamp issued, in such manner and at such time as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe; and the Commissioner may, in his discretion, make assessment therefor."

Mr. MORRISON. This bill was drawn at the Treasury Department, and contains the provisions of the original section on the same subject, omitting only so much of it as the court decided allowed commissions to the collectors in addition to their salaries. Unless some further explanation be desired, or there be some objection, I move the previous question.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. What is the effect of the bill upon the salaries of the collectors?

Mr. MORRISON. It leaves the salaries exactly as they are under the law; it simply cuts off the commissions.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENTRY OF MERCHANDISE SAVED FROM WRECKS.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9653) to amend section 3058 of the Revised Statutes, and that the bill be now considered in the House. It is a bill upon which the Committee on Ways and Means are unanimous.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3058 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3058. All merchandise imported into the United States shall, for the purpose of this title, be deemed and held to be the property of the person to whom the merchandise may be consigned; but the holder of any bill of lading consigned to order and properly indorsed shall be deemed the consignee thereof; and in case of the abandonment of any merchandise to the underwriters, the latter may be recognized as the consignee; and, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, merchandise saved from a vessel wrecked or abandoned at sea, or on or along the coasts of the United States, and promptly brought into a port of the United States by or in possession of the salvors of the same, can, for the purpose of its title, be regarded as the property of such salvors, and the valuation thereof and payment of duties thereon can be made accordingly and with due reference to the condition of the said merchandise as thus saved and the necessities of the case: Provided, however, That such bringing in by salvors shall be in good faith and without intent to evade the just payment of duty: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prejudice in any other respect the rights of property, or of or through abandonment or allowance of the owner, or any other person interested in said merchandise."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and that it now be considered in the House. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not affect the revenue in any way. It permits salvors to enter abandoned goods, which, strange to say in this age of the world, our laws do not now permit. The case became emergent in consequence of the wreck of the Oregon. The salvors have brought in many hundreds of cases of goods. There were no claimants to ownership, and even the insurance companies, to whom I suppose all the goods were abandoned, are not permitted by statute to enter the goods. The consequence has been that many of the goods have positively rotted, and at last, to avoid trouble, the collector has allowed the goods to be entered, but has insisted upon the payment of duties in advance of the entry. Now, the value of the goods in many cases is quite uncertain, and thus an unseemly controversy now exists in the port of New York.

This bill has been framed in concurrence with the Treasury Department to meet the difficulties of that situation. In effect it allows persons in possession of merchandise to make entry at the custom-house for the payment of duties, all rights of ownership being reserved to whomsoever may put in any claim. The bill simply enables the merchandise to go through the custom-house, reserving all private and personal rights. There is a letter from the Treasury Department approving the bill. That letter can be read if any gentleman desires it. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEWITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BONDS OF CIGAR MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 8966, and that it be now considered in the House. This bill proposes to reduce the amount of the bond required to be given by cigar manufacturers. That bond is now required to be of the same amount as it was when the tax was double the present rate. This bill merely proposes to reduce the amount of the bond in proportion to the reduction of taxes made some years ago.

Mr. HENLEY. Before unanimous consent is given to this request I want to say that in the debate in this House last Saturday on fixing the order of business for to-day it was stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that the object of the adoption of the resolution fixing this order of business was to reach a certain joint resolution of the House, No. 126.

A MEMBER. That will be reached.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] made the same statement. Now, the better part of this day has passed, and it would seem we are not going to reach that joint resolution at all. So far as I am concerned I desire to reach that resolution and dispose of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of a bill the title of which will be read, and that the House now proceed to the consideration of the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8966) to so further amend section 3387 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, as to reduce the penal sum of the bonds of cigar manufacturers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois, and the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3387 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 16 of the act approved the 1st day of March, 1879, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to internal revenue," be further amended by striking out all after the number and substituting the following:

"Every person, before commencing, or, if he has already commenced, before continuing, the manufacture of cigars, shall furnish, without previous demand therefor, to the collector of the district, a statement in duplicate, under oath, setting forth the place, and, if in a city, the street and number of the street, where the manufacture is to be carried on, and when the same are to be manufactured for, or to be sold and delivered to, any other person, the name and residence and business or occupation of the person for whom they are to be manufactured or to whom they are to be delivered, and shall give a bond, in conformity with the provisions of this title, in such penal sum as the collector may require, not less that $250, with an additional $50 for each person proposed to be employed by him in making cigars; and the sum of said bond may be increased from time to time and additional sureties required, at the discretion of the collector or under the instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But in no case shall the penal sum of said bond exceed $20,000. Said bond shall be conditioned that he shall not engage in any attempt, by himself or by collusion with others, to defraud the Government of any tax on his manufactures; that he shall render correctly all the returns, statements, and inventories prescribed; that whenever he shall add to the number of cigar-makers employed by him he shall immediately give notice thereof to the collector of the district; that he shall stamp, in accordance with law, all cigars manufactured by him before he offers the same or any part thereof for sale, and before he removes any part thereof from the place of manufacture; that he shall not knowingly sell, purchase, expose, or receive for sale any cigars which have not been stamped as required by law; and that he shall comply with all the requirements of law relating to the manufacture of cigars. Every cigar-manufacturer shall obtain from the collector of the district, who is hereby required to issue the same, a certificate setting forth the number of cigar-makers for which the bond has been given, and shall keep the same posted in a conspicuous place within the manufactory; and every cigar-manufacturer who neglects or refuses to obtain such certificate, or to keep the same posted as hereinbefore provided, shall be fined $100; and every person who manufactures cigars of any description without first giving bond as herein required shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than five years. Cigarettes and cheroots shall be held to be cigars under the meaning of this chapter."

Mr. MCADOO. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill does not in any way affect the revenues of the Government. The law under which bonds are required from cigar-manufacturers has become oppressive from the fact that while the tax upon cigars has been reduced one-half, the amount required to be covered by the bond is the same as before the reduction of the tax. The Committee on Ways and Means are unanimous in the opinion that as the tax on cigars has been reduced, there ought to be a corresponding reduction in the penal sum of the bond required of cigar-manufacturers. If no further explanation be desired, I move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXATION OF SMALL DISTILLERIES.

Mr. MORRISON. I have one, and only one, other request to make before calling up the measure which the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] has expressed his desire to have considered. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 8327, and that the bill be now considered in the House. It is a bill relating to the collection of the revenues in small distilleries.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8327) to reduce the number of internal-revenue officers, provide a better and more economical administration of the internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before action is taken upon the request for unanimous consent I ask that the whole bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That section 3255 of the Revised Statutes shall be amended by adding at the end of said section the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt all distilleries which mash 5 bushels of grain or less per day from the operations of the provisions of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax, which said tax shall be levied and collected on the capacity of said distilleries; and said distilleries shall be run and operated without storekeepers or 'storekeepers and gaugers.' And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of said Secretary, may exempt any distillery or all distilleries which mash over 5 and not more than 25 bushels of grain per day from the operations of the provisions of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax, which said tax shall be assessed and collected upon the capacity of the distillery so exempted, as hereinbefore provided. And the said Commissioner, with the approval of said Secretary, may establish special warehouses, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of said distilleries to be designated by him, and in which any distiller operating any such distillery may deposit his product, which when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations as to bonds, tax, removals, and otherwise as other warehouses. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

SEC. 2. That section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by striking out all after said number and substituting therefor the following:

"The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, grapes, or other fruits from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so."

SEC. 3. That the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to the production of fruit-brandy, and to punish frauds connected with the same," approved March 3, 1877, be extended and made applicable to brandy distilled from apples or peaches, or from any other fruit the brandy distilled from which is not now required, or hereafter shall not be required, to be deposited in a distillery warehouse: Provided, That each of the warehouses established under said act, or which may hereafter be established, shall be in charge either of a storekeeper or a storekeeper and gauger, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

SEC. 4. That section 3332 of the Revised Statutes, and the supplement thereto, shall be amended so that said section shall read as follows:

"When a judgment of forfeiture, in any case of seizure, is recovered against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of distilled spirits, because no bond has been given, or against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of spirits, having a registered producing capacity of less than 150 gallons a day, every still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, mash-tub, and fermenting-tub therein shall be sold, as in case of other forfeited property, without being mutilated or destroyed. And in case of seizure of a still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, fermenting-tub, mash-tub, or other distilling apparatus of any kind whatsoever, for any offense involving forfeiture of the same, it shall be the duty of the seizing officer to remove the same from the place where seized to a place of safe storage; and said property so seized shall be sold as provided by law, but without being mutilated or destroyed."

SEC. 5. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I object to discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this bill and to its consideration in the House; and further I make the point it does not come within the order, as it is a revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine objects to the consideration of the bill in the House, and makes the point of order it is a bill raising revenue. The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. DINGLEY. It takes certain distilleries of spirits from apples, peaches, and grapes out from under the general laws for the protection of the revenue. It makes serious changes in those laws.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to determine from the reading of the bill whether it affects the revenue or not, and for this reason: Under the law as it now stands spirits manufactured in these small distilleries pay a tax of 90 cents per gallon. The bill proposes they may hereafter pay 90 cents per gallon upon the capacity of the still without regard to the quantity made. Whether that would increase or decrease the revenue is a matter of argument.

Mr. DINGLEY. It was distinctly understood bills relating to the revenue should not be included in the order.

The SPEAKER. The language of the resolution is the language of the rule of the House, bills raising revenue.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That language has the same meaning as revenue bills and it was understood distinctly that revenue bills should not be considered under this order.

The SPEAKER. It has been decided if a bill decreases the revenue it comes within the meaning of the language of the Constitution, to raise revenue, and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Supposing a bill is introduced reducing the rate of the tax, and it were argued on the floor in consequence of that reduction there would be a greater amount manufactured and therefore the amount of tax paid would be precisely the same as before, would the Chair decide on that account that was not a bill raising revenue?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would look at the face of the bill itself.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. And the face of the bill shows it is a change of tax imposed on certain distillers from actual survey to capacity. Is not that a revenue bill?

The SPEAKER. It changes the mode of collecting the 90 cents a gallon by providing instead of being paid on the actual product of the distiller it shall be paid on the surveyed capacity of the distillery.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. When a bill is introduced making a change, looking to the Chair to decide it is either a bill raising revenue or not, ought not the Chair to be able to decide the amount of tax will be precisely the same?

The SPEAKER. The Chair must decide the question if he can from the face of the bill.

Mr. ROWELL. This is evidently a revenue bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to refer to the RECORD. The question put to the gentleman from Illinois was precisely this:

Mr. MCKINLEY. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?
Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.
Mr. MCKINLEY. My question is whether it is the purpose under this resolution assigning a day to the Committee on Ways and Means to consider the bills relating to treaties?
Mr. MORRISON. It is not. The treaties all affect the revenue question. We do not propose to consider any of them or anything involving that question under this order if the House shall pass or approve it.

Mr. MORRISON. And if this bill involves that question I do not insist on its being considered.

Mr. MCKINLEY. It undoubtedly affects the revenue.

The SPEAKER. No doubt it affects the revenue.

Mr. ROWELL. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. CABELL. This bill only requires that distillers shall pay tax on the capacity of their stills. The result will be to raise about the same revenue as is now being collected by the tax on the amount produced. Distillers will be assessed according to the number of gallons their stills are capable of producing; if they produce more than the assessment they pay for it under the general law. Under the present law they are required to produce so many gallons from every bushel of grain distilled. This bill only changes the mode of collecting, by assessing and regulating the capacity of the still and doing away with storekeepers, thus relieving the distiller of annoyance and the Government of expense.

The SPEAKER. Under the present law the distillery is first surveyed to ascertain its capacity and then the manufacturer of spirits is required to produce 2½ gallons of each bushel mashed.

But suppose he actually produces more than the surveyed capacity of the distillery would indicate, he still must pay 90 cents a gallon on the overproduct.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. The effect would be the same in that regard under the present system, and would not be changed if this becomes a law. The product of the distillery over and above its registered capacity must be paid under existing law, and if this becomes law that is not changed. But it affects the expenses of the system in this, by abolishing a large number of offices, and we propose to show if we can get an opportunity to explain the bill that by this means it will save in the neighborhood of $300,000 annually. I wish to say further, Mr. Speaker, to the House that this meets the approval of the people regardless of party and of the officials there, both Republicans and Democrats. All favor it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But would it not increase the net revenue $300,000, according to the gentleman's own statement?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. No, sir; it would save that amount of expenditure.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But that amount of money would be left in the Treasury instead of being paid out.

Mr. CABELL. Well, there ought not to be any objection to that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There is no objection to it; but it is simply in reference to the point of order that I make the suggestion.

Mr. CABELL. This does not increase taxation at all.

The SPEAKER. The bill is somewhat lengthy, and the Chair has not carefully examined all of its provisions, but will ask the gentleman who reported it, Does this bill provide, in case this class of distilleries actually produce more than their surveyed capacity indicates, that they shall pay 90 cents a gallon on the surplus, because that is undoubtedly the law now?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. This provides in that respect just what the present statute provides. They survey the distillery and estimate its capacity at so much. If it makes more than the estimated capacity the distiller must account for it.

The SPEAKER. Is that provided in the bill? The Chair has not observed such a provision.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. That is expressly provided, sir; according to the capacity.

The SPEAKER. That is, the surveyed capacity; but suppose it produces more than the surveyed capacity?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. If it does, the distiller must account for it, and under the general law, which is not affected by this bill, he would be compelled to account for it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, my consideration of this act is that it changes the mode by which the tax on the distilleries which come under the operation of the act shall be collected; and frankly speaking, sir, it may make a change in the revenue. It may increase or decrease it. Under the present law these distillers must make a certain amount of spirits. If they make more than that amount they must pay the tax upon it. Under this law the capacity has to be surveyed and ascertained by some regulation established by the Department; and if that capacity is not reached or exceeded the distiller must pay up to it. If it is exceeded, if he makes over the surveyed capacity of the still, I do not see under this act how it is to be accounted for.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair can not see.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. But that does not necessarily, the Chair will perceive, change the revenue. It does not change the amount of tax per gallon, and it is to be presumed that the capacity of the still, as surveyed by the Government officers, under the regulations established by those Government officers, will be equal to the running capacity of the still. One of the objects the committee had in view in reporting the bill was that the internal revenue, fairly practicable, would be obtained in this way, because they supposed that the capacity of the still would be fully set out by the survey and regulations.

The SPEAKER. It is very evident that the principal object of the bill was merely to change the mode of assessing the tax——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If the Chair will permit me to interrupt a moment, that was not the principal object, but it was a subsidiary object. Our belief was, as to the principal object of the bill, that the number of storekeepers employed in these small distilleries, and the consequent cost to the Government, could be reduced by making this change, and it was to get rid of an army of office-holders and remove the annoyance and irritation caused by the present system that this was reported.

The SPEAKER. But one of the objects of the bill at least was to change the mode of assessing the tax.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. That is to say that the capacity of the distillery was to be surveyed and that the expense of storekeepers and gaugers were to be dispensed with, and the distillery taxed according to its capacity. But the difficulty in the mind of the Chair is whether or not the legal effect of the bill would not be to exempt from tax the surplus product over and above the surveyed capacity of the distillery.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I submit that under the general law, which, as I have stated, is not changed, the distillery would be compelled to pay the tax on the surplus produced by the distillery. Every gallon, every particle of spirits produced at the distillery is subject to a tax of 90 cents a gallon. This bill does not affect that at all, because its provisions go on to say it may be assessed according to the capacity.

Mr. WILLIS. But how is that to be ascertained when you have abolished the gaugers? This bill does away with the gaugers and storekeepers.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. That name of gauger is a mere technical one. It does not abolish the gauger as an office, but it changes the system to the extent of requiring these surveys to be made.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Let me inquire, does not this provide expressly the tax shall be collected on the capacity?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has asked unanimous consent that this bill shall be considered in the House. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] objected. What has become of that objection?

The SPEAKER. Another question of order has been raised whether the bill could be considered at all under the order assigning this day to the Committee on Ways and Means. It must be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, if considered at all, if the point is made; but some gentleman made the point that the Chair under the order for to-day could not entertain the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois to take this bill up.

Mr. COWLES. If the House will permit me, I think I can make this clear in one moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to know what the present law is, and how it is changed in the bill?

Mr. COWLES. I can explain the difference in the two systems. By an amendment to the revenue law made some years ago there was a difference made in the system of collecting taxes on fruit brandy and that on whisky made from grain. That amendment provided there should be what are known as brandy-gaugers, who itinerate in the performance of their duties, going from distillery to distillery gauging the amount made between their visits. They are different from storekeepers, who remain at the distillery. Yet these officers at the whisky distilleries are styled in the general law storekeepers and gaugers. This amendment, as I am informed, is intended to provide a system for operating small whisky distilleries, mashing 5 bushels or less of grain per day, similar to that now in force for brandy distilleries, and if it does that no one should have any objection to it.

A provision is put in this bill doing away with storekeepers and gaugers at distilleries of a less capacity than 5 bushels a day. It does not do away with the office of gauger. An officer goes to the distillery, guages the capacity of the still, and assesses the amount which the distiller has to pay. A gauger pays his regular visits to the distillery, and a deputy collector also, and the brandy made can not be lawfully put anywhere except in the brandy warehouse, and if so it is liable to seizure.

Mr. STEELE. What office does this bill dispense with?

Mr. COWLES. With the office of storekeeper at the distillery.

Mr. STEELE. Does it not give a better chance to the moonshiner?

Mr. COWLES. It does not give the moonshiner a better chance than now, and it removes great sources of fraud in the execution of the revenue law, as has been already explained. More clear money will be derived to the Government, and the citizen will have more freedom in the execution of his business and no greater inducements or chances to perpetrate frauds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the only question now before the House is the question on the point of order.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I desire to call the attention of the House to a clause in the bill which expressly provides a tax shall be paid:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of said Secretary, may exempt any distillery or all distilleries which mash over 5 and not more than 25 bushels of grain per day from the operations of the provisions of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax, which said tax shall be assessed and collected upon the capacity of the distillery so exempted, as hereinbefore provided.

And at the end of the section there is this provision:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

Under the general law the tax is assessed. There is a special provision that these distilleries shall be exempt as to these storekeepers except as to the payment of the tax. The tax is assessed on the distillery as now. If the distiller makes half a gallon over he is bound to return it and the tax is assessed. And the Revenue Department has power to provide rules and regulations for carrying out the general law. The provision, therefore, is made that they shall not be exempt from the tax, and full power is given to the Revenue Department to make rules and regulations to carry that out. I submit this bill is substantially in the language of the original statute, but changes the mode of collecting the revenue.

The SPEAKER. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury is simply to make rules and regulations to secure the collection of tax assessed on the capacity of the distillery. The Chair thinks this is a bill raising revenue, and if it is, it has its privilege under another rule of the House. The House can go into Committee of the Whole at any time to consider it.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will withdraw his objection. This is a special relief we have asked for our section of the country.

Mr. CABELL. If there is an insuperable objection in the minds of gentlemen of the House to the passage of this bill with these clauses in it, I ask that the remainder of the bill be considered with these clauses stricken out. Certainly the remainder of the bill will not be objected to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that this bill is privileged under the rules of the House, but it does not come up under the order for to-day.

THE SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the joint resolution in relation to surplus.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 126) directing payment of the surplus in the Treasury on the public debt.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the joint resolution which will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the surplus or balance in the Treasury, including amount held for redemption of United States notes, shall exceed the sum of $100,000,000, it shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to apply such excess, in sums not less than ten millions per month, during the existence of any such surplus or excess, to the payment of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States payable at the option of the Government—

Mr. MCKINLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] permit me to have an amendment read at this time so that it may be before the House?

Mr. MORRISON. It may be read now, to be offered at the proper time.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the resolution the following:
"Provided, That said sum of $100,000,000 herein excepted and reserved, which amount was purchased by the sale of bonds to the extent of ninety-five and a half millions, and the balance by reservation from the revenue under authority of the act of January 14, 1875, entitled 'An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments,' shall be maintained, as provided by said act, and set apart for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tender notes of the United States when presented for payment, and said fund shall not be used for any other purpose."

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I also desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting the following:
"Provided, Nothing hereinbefore contained shall authorize the reduction of, or the payment of any part of the one hundred million reserve set apart for the payment of United States notes upon the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States."

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add the following:
"Provided, The words 'surplus' and 'balance' in this resolution shall be construed to mean all money in the Treasury against which there is no actual demand liability of the Government other than greenbacks for redemption. Also, in line 5, strike out the words 'one hundred' and insert the word 'fifty.'"

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to have read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That after the passage of this act whenever and as fast as the circulating notes of national banks are redeemed or canceled as provided by the act of June 3, 1864, and amendments thereto, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued in place of such bank notes redeemed, dollar for dollar, United States notes in denominations as nearly as may be of the bank notes redeemed, and all laws applicable to United States notes now in circulation are hereby made applicable to the notes issued under this act.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, these amendments are read for information only, and are not considered as now pending. In view of the press for time I shall content myself, for the present at least, with making a very brief statement of the purpose of this joint resolution.

The money of the country, coin and paper, or, to be more specific, gold, silver, United States notes, and national-bank notes, amount to $1,556,000,000, or more exactly, $1,556,914,798. Of this sum $525,664,054, or more than one-third of all the money of the country, was in the United States Treasury when this joint resolution was introduced here. Since then the amount and balance in the Treasury has been a little reduced by monthly payments on the public debt. Much more than half the money in the Treasury, in fact most of it, is there for specific or special purposes designated by law. The sum of $182,000,000, and more, is there to redeem outstanding gold, silver, and United States note certificates; as much as seventy millions to redeem national-bank notes, the greater part banks in liquidation, broken, or surrendering circulation; twenty-two millions to pay interest due, interest accrued not due, and small amounts of debt due, and twenty-nine and a half millions for disbursing officers, balances, Treasurer's transfer checks, and other like purposes, being so much movable cash or working balance for the current transactions of the Government. Deducting all these sums for specific uses, running or current liabilities, and there remains in the Treasury a very little more than $200,000,000 held there for current uses, including that held to redeem Treasury or legal-tender notes. These legal-tender notes are by law money to be paid out as other money, whether they come into the Treasury as debt redeemed due from or as money taken in payment of a debt due to the Government.

The amount of money held or to be held as reserve for the redemption of United States notes, should they be presented for redemption, is not fixed by law; it is or may be called a discretionary reserve; and as the law has not fixed the amount of this reserve or redemption fund the amount of the surplus can not be exactly stated. The amount of reserve which may be legally and rightly held to redeem these notes is the sum necessary for the purpose—necessary in the light of experience in financial transactions, and more especially in the light of the Treasury experience in the matter of redeeming treasury notes. The surplus is the amount in the Treasury after deducting this reserve and the several amounts set apart by law for specific purposes and classed as liabilities. It was the practice under former Secretaries to estimate the redemption fund or reserve at $100,000,000, and the present Secretary sets aside that specific sum as one of the continuing liabilities of his Department.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And it is in gold coin, I believe.

Mr. MORRISON. I call all money money. Of course there is always more than $100,000,000 of gold coin in the Treasury. The amount there now is $156,793,748 net, in all $232,838,123.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But the $100,000,000 set aside by the present Secretary of the Treasury is in gold, I believe.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not know that it is separated from other funds except for convenience.

A MEMBER. It is not.

Mr. MORRISON. But counting the reserve at $100,000,000, there is still what may be called a surplus of $100,000,000. Of this, $29,000,000 and more of fractional silver coin is not available, that is, it would not be money for any purpose beyond payments of $10, which, I believe, is the limit of its legal-tender quality.

A MEMBER. Twenty dollars.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Of what is that $28,000,000 made up?

Mr. MORRISON. Of fractional coin—half-dollars, quarter-dollars, and minor coin.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And copper coin.

Mr. MORRISON. There was in January last and still is a surplus in the Treasury of $100,000,000, but because of this fractional coin being unavailable as money, this joint resolution would only take $70,000,000 out of the Treasury, for after the payment of seven calls or $70,000,000 there could not be another call and another payment until the $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 had again reached $10,000,000 in excess of the $100,000,000.

Beginning with last February, monthly calls and payments of $10,000,000 each were made of that part of the interest-bearing public debt which is payable whenever we are ready and willing to pay it. The purpose of this resolution is to continue those monthly calls and payments as often as there is more than $110,000,000 in the Treasury, after deducting all the balances and all the liabilities as before stated, and also the unavailable fractional silver coin.

I do not myself consider so large an amount necessary, but in deference to the opinion of others and out of abundant caution it may be and I believe it is prudent for the present to leave to the discretion of the Treasury Department any payments which would permanently reduce the reserve below $100,000,000.

The application of one hundred millions which now lie unused and unproductive to that part of our debt which is payable whenever we are able and willing to pay it would put that much more money to its legitimate uses. It would tend to make money cheaper, increase the means of exchange, and help in the transaction of business.

A hundred millions of money is the capital which employs a hundred thousand men in productive industries; together they make $2,000,000,000 worth of products, and add $70,000,000 to the annual wealth of the country. It would save us from $3,000,000 of annual interest and annual taxes which we are now paying. More than that, it will take away something of the temptation which leads us here in Congress to vote large appropriations and make improvident expenditures in which we pretend to justify ourselves because there is too much money in the Treasury.

The minority of the Committee on Ways and Means oppose this resolution on the ground that it will shake public confidence in the Treasury of the United States and in its ability to meet its engagements. Most of the minority say that there ought to be $100,000,000—nothing less—specially set apart for the purpose of redeeming Treasury notes, if any were ever presented to be redeemed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will not the gentleman allow me to suggest that "the minority" has some very excellent company in that position?

Mr. MORRISON. I will state it all. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], who makes that "excellent company," thinks that $100,000,000, besides the thirty or more million dollars of working balance, is not reserve enough. I believe I correctly state the position of the gentleman. He thinks that the working balance or movable cash in the Treasury, together with the reserve, ought to be as much as $168,000,000. That, I believe, is the amount named in his report. The other gentlemen, if I understand them, think that $130,000,000 would answer for both reserve and current transactions.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I was speaking of "the gentleman from New York" at the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. MORRISON. All the "gentlemen from New York" are to be classed together on the money question. [Laughter.] That is probably no fault of theirs. There is a possibility that, having more money than the rest of us, or some of us, they understand the money question better. When I come to think so or am certain of that fact I will vote with them.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is as I believe not true. Why should it be true, that to reduce the money in the Treasury to $100,000,000 would destroy or impair public confidence in the ability of the Government to meet its obligations? In the seven years during which this theoretical redemption of legal-tenders has been going on, the average of the money kept in the Treasury has been about $150,000,000; and so far as I know, no dollar of the United States notes for which $100,000,000 has been reserved was ever redeemed. It may be that there have been nominal redemptions.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Illinois will allow me to state that the redemptions during the first year after the redemption act went into effect amounted to $12,000.

Mr. MORRISON. As to the $30,000,000 balance which the minority think ought to be in the Treasury in addition to the $100,000,000, the accounts are so kept that the Treasury and reserve will always be protected. The $30,000,000 to the credit of the Post-Office Department and the other disbursing officers, or about $29,500,000, is a sufficient working balance. Gentlemen will see that it has been kept up to this average.

When this movable cash falls a little below it you will see the deficiency added or made up next month as one of the liabilities of the Treasury. The accounts are so kept that the Treasury will never be surprised. The Treasury officials estimate among the liabilities, and very properly, not only what we owe now, but at the end of each month they count as a liability the interest which has accrued during that month and is to be paid at the end may be of six months. So that when the interest is paid you do not have to reduce in any way for that purpose the balance or surplus in the Treasury, the interest having been already set aside and classed as one of the liabilities. In this way the Treasury protects itself and always has a sufficient working balance.

Now, I desire that there should be no misunderstanding, and I do not wish to be misunderstood.

I concede that it might be for a very short time the $100,000,000 could possibly be trenched upon. Suppose to-day a call was made, when the amount in the Treasury was $110,000,000, which reduced it to $100,000,000, and to-morrow the million or more of daily receipts should not be quite sufficient to meet to-morrow's obligations, the Treasury might temporarily trench upon the $100,000,000. But the way the accounts are kept, with the vast amount to the credit of disbursing officers, it could not be more than temporary, and to a small amount, because no call could again be made until the Treasury was so replenished again to $110,000,000.

And why shall this not be deemed sufficient? How much reserve or redemption fund do the national banks keep to redeem their currency? The gentleman from New York will say the banks will redeem their own currency. But we have guaranteed that redemption. And what is put up as a guarantee to enable us to meet that cash obligation? Ten and a half million of dollars are in the Treasury to enable the Secretary to make that guarantee and redeem the national-bank notes if the national banks themselves fail. Yet we must have $100,000,000, not a cent less for a single day, to guarantee the redemption of notes which are never redeemed. We stamp the national banks with our guarantee and promise to redeem and do redeem, if they do not, all their circulation, and for this they keep in the Treasury 5 per cent.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The national banks keep Government bonds to redeem their circulation, and those Government bonds have a marketable value all the world over.

Mr. MORRISON. That is true. To redeem legal-tendar notes, if the emergency should occur, the Treasury can issue 5, 4½, or 4 per cent. bonds to redeem legal-tenders. These, too, would be marketable.

No one wants the Secretary to do this. No one expects him to do it. No one expects him to be required to do it in this great country of ours with its vast resources and excessive incomes.

Not only this, but we stamp our indorsement of credit on the national banks, and because of the credit indorsement we give them they receive deposits. We authorize them to receive deposits, requiring them to keep but 10 per cent. to redeem the deposits. My colleague [Mr. PLUMB], himself a banker, nods assent. I know gentlemen from New York say they keep 25 per cent. We repealed that requirement back in 1874 and agreed national banks should keep nothing for circulation except the 5 per cent. in the Treasury. We also provided banks should keep 10 per cent. for paying deposits, and 5 per cent in the Treasury to redeem circulation to be counted in as part of the reserve of 15 per cent. of deposits, which practically reduced the reserve for deposits to 10 per cent.

Mr. HEWITT. Does that apply to the banks of New York?

Mr. MORRISON. I think so.

Mr. HEWITT. I think not.

Mr. MORRISON. I think so. But if the gentleman is aware of any provision of law on the subject I should like to hear it. They may in New York keep more than in country or interior banks as a matter of prudence, but they do not do it as a matter of law I think.

Mr. HEWITT. You are mistaken about it.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman says I am mistaken about that. It is possible. I have been mistaken many times. The gentleman knows more about New York and New York banking than I do. I have given some attention, however, to the subject, and still it may be the law is different in the large cities.

Then, Mr. Speaker, with one hundred million in the Treasury, which I have shown can never be trenched upon but temporarily, and then to a very trifling or limited extent, with receipts of a million a day and nearly always in excess of the daily expenditures, with unlimited power to issue bonds if any emergency should arise, what is there in this proposition which should shake the confidence of anybody in the Government. Gentlemen who object to the possibility of encroaching on the hundred million legal-tender reserve believe the national-bank guarantee amply sufficient with 5 per cent. as a redemption fund for circulation and 10 per cent. for deposits. We want nearly twenty times as much for the Treasury.

As for the banks whenever anything is to be done or is proposed affecting the finances, the newspapers tell us—I do not know what the gentleman from New York and the minority of the committee will tell us—that we are trying to reach a silver basis; that that is our intention, or that we are ignorant of the effect of what we are attempting. This is the way we are usually answered—the only answer we get. Since I offered this resolution $44,000,000 of bonds have been called in and the net gold balance in the Treasury is $20,000,000 more than when this joint resolution was introduced.

If, then, the payment of $44,000,000 has been made while the net gold balance has been increasing there need be no apprehension from continued monthly payments aggregating $90,000,000 additional in the next seven months. I apprehend nothing but good from it—good both to the Treasury and to the country.

Mr. Chairman, I have said all I care to say now, but lest I may want to occupy further time I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois if this resolution confers any authority upon the Secretary of the Treasury he does not now possess if he chooses to exercise it?

Mr. MORRISON. None.

Mr. HEWITT. Before the gentleman from Illinois takes his seat I wish to direct his attention to page 66 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, and he will find that the banks in New York and certain other reserve cities must have 25 per cent. reserved, while the country banks are required to have but 15 per cent by law.

Mr. MORRISON. But the 5 per cent. in the Treasury must be taken into consideration——

Mr. HEWITT. Yes, sir; but the banks in New York and other reserve cities must have 25 per cent. by the law, as the gentleman will see by looking at this table appended here.

Mr. MORRISON. I would rather see the law; but supposing the gentleman from New York to be correct, as he probably is, all banks put up but 5 per cent. of the circulation; city banks 20 per cent. and country banks 10 per cent. additional on deposits.

Mr. HEWITT. The gentleman will find it quoted here. [Indicating.]

Mr. BLAND. But that 25 per cent. is on the deposits, not on the circulation.

Mr. HEWITT. Yes.

Mr. MORRISON. Then we are talking of two very different things. It is legal-tender circulation which the reserve is to redeem. Still I have spoken of both circulation and deposits.

Mr. DINGLEY. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois how much would be paid out under that resolution under the statement of the condition of the Treasury as shown on the 30th day of June, 1886—what is the balance that would be paid?

Mr. MORRISON. Under this resolution, if the condition of the Treasury remains the same, it would pay out $10,000,000 for seven successive months, and then if the Treasury balance was not increased there would not be another ten millions paid next month, nor until the surplus reached ten millions above the one hundred millions fixed by the joint resolution as the amount to be kept in the Treasury.

Mr. McKINLEY. Let me ask the gentleman if he includes also in this computation the twenty-eight millions of fractional silver coin?

Mr. MORRISON. I take the exhibit in the statement prepared by the United States Treasurer, who evidently knows how to keep books, state accounts, and balances, and from this statement $29,000,000 are in the Treasury not available and which can not be used. Of course nobody thinks of using that for the redemption of bonds. If the Government can find a way to utilize this money for current expenses, a like sum of money might be utilized in the redemption of bonds. In that or some other way this money might be made to swell the surplus, but I do not know that anything of the kind is practicable.

Mr. McKINLEY. But the gentleman's resolution refers to the balance or surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKINLEY. And among these balances is included the twenty-eight millions of subsidiary silver coin. Now do you include that?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; we are informed by the Treasury statement that it is not available, and I do not count it as surplus and it will not be until it can be utilized.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The Treasurer makes a total footing of $104,000,000, including the minor coin.

Mr. McKINLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he has any objection to excluding the twenty-eight millions.

Mr. MORRISON. None whatever.

Mr. McKINLEY. Because this amount, as the gentleman will see here, as tabulated——

Mr. MORRISON. But the gentleman is theorizing. If it can not be used under the resolution nor at all except to pay a ten-dollar debt.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Illinois that the surplus in the Treasury applicable, and which is proposed to be paid under this resolution, would be between seventy and seventy-five million of dollars?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir; seventy-eight to-day.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, I notice by a report of the Treasurer for the 30th day of June, 1886, as compared with the Treasurer's report upon the 4th of March, 1885, that the available surplus increased during that period sixty-six millions of dollars; and yet there are only seventy-five millions to be paid out. Now, my question is, what has become of the four hundred millions of idle money or surplus which it was charged existed before the 4th of March, 1885, when with an addition of sixty-six millions more only about seventy millions are now available for payment?

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman is hardly sincere in that long question. He is wandering in the domain of politics. I am not running a campaign at this time, nor helping him in that direction.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It was only a campaign story. I will explain it.

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly, and I am not now doing campaign work.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I know you are not; but you might have to correct a brother who made the statement.

Mr. MORRISON. I am not contradicting nor giving attention to the statement made by the gentleman in his question. It may be a very proper question to ask the gentlemen who said there was a surplus of $400,000,000.

Mr. COBB. It was Mr. Calkins, who, while candidate for the governorship of Indiana, made that speech, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] knows very well.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will first call the attention of the Committee to the marked and remarkable manner in which this proposition, "that whenever the surplus or balance in the Treasury, including the amount held for redemption of United States notes, shall exceed the sum of $100,000,000, it shall be, and it is hereby made, the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to apply such excess, in sums not less than $10,000,000 per month, during the existence of any such surplus or excess, to the payment of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States payable at the option of the Government," has come here for consideration.

It was reported to the House by the Democratic majority of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Consideration has been obtained for it by the action of the Democratic Speaker of the House, the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, they three acting together to that end, as a majority of the Committee on Rules; and they have brought it here against the emphatic protest of the present Democratic administration.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter of February 13, says in regard to it:

> After nearly twelve months' experience in the conduct of this Department and forecasting as well as I am able the future requirements of the Treasury, as now defined by existing law and as they may be affected by legislation yet to come, and considering the course of future receipts, which are liable to be influenced by many causes, such as the fluctuation of imports, the prolonged depression of trade, and the marketing of more or less of our agricultural products abroad, I can not now foresee a state of things which will make it prudent.

So then, we have the proposition before us, supported by the three leaders of the majority and as vigorously opposed by the administration that they were elected to be in sympathy with and support; and this is not a disagreement over a matter of mere detail in administration; the difference is as wide as that between the two great political parties of the country, and it is an attempt on the part of the leaders in the House to force the payment of the national debts and obligations in silver, to force the Government in its financial transactions to a silver basis of payment, and which the administration earnestly and determinedly resists. There is not nor can there be a compromise between the opposing forces upon this great financial question.

I know that one of the arguments used for the proposition is that by this action there will be a saving in interest to the Government. But the complete answer to that is that the interest upon the sum of money the resolution would apply upon the public debt is upwards of $2,225,000 less than the non-interest-bearing indebtedness of the Government, to the payment of which the reserves in the Treasury are pledged.

The legal-tender notes amount to $346,681,000. By the law of March 18, 1869, "the faith of the United States was solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all of the obligations of the United States, not bearing interest, known as United States notes." Again, July 12, 1882, Congress "provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of gold certificates whenever the gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000."

Under these provisions of the law the Secretaries of the Treasury have accumulated and held, and the present Secretary approves the policy, $100,000,000 in gold for the payment of those notes. So strongly does Mr. Manning approve of the amount of this reserve that in his letter of February 13 in regard to the pending resolution, in speaking of this reserve, he says:

> This is in no sense a surplus, but is set apart and appropriated as a minimum security and reserve for the redemption and payment of $346,681,000.16 of United States notes which have been issued, and this reserve amounting to $100,000,000 should of course be held above all possibility of encroachment.

But, notwithstanding his emphatic protest, a joint resolution is pressed here to direct the payment, in part at least, of that reserve upon other indebtedness than that for the payment of which by law it is pledged.

The present balance of the Treasury, exclusive of fractional coin and exclusive of the $100,000,000 reserve pledged for the payment of United States notes, is $75,000,000. This surplus is wholly made up of silver coin. The gold and legal tenders now in the Treasury in excess of that $100,000,000 is, say, $56,000,000 in gold and $20,000,000 in legal-tenders. Of this sum $70,000,000 is, or should be, held as a trust fund for the redemption of the national-bank notes—sixty millions of it is pledged for the payment of the notes of banks that "have failed," "have suspended," and are "reducing circulation," and whose circulation is in the hands of the people—as the law for the redemption of these notes provides that the sum deposited by the banks shall be paid in legal-tender notes or their equivalent; and at the expense of repeating, I say bear in mind this is not for the security of the banks, but of the bill-holders, of the people. This leaves only the sum of $6,000,000, which is not sufficient to pay the Alabama claims, which will be paid within the next month.

It is proposed by the terms of this resolution that the sum now in the Treasury in excess of $100,000,000, including the $100,000,000 held for the redemption of United States notes, shall be paid for the redemption of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States payable at the option of the Government, and amounting, say, to $135,000,000, in sums of not less than $10,000,000 per month.

This is a declaration that United States bonds shall be paid in silver dollars. The country and the world, debtors and creditors, will so understand it.

It is practicably impossible to execute the joint resolution without.

Keeping good the reserves, the money which is put up as security to pay the notes of banks which have failed or suspended and for the security of national-bank circulation, money which does not belong to the Government—keeping good the reserve to pay the Treasury notes now outstanding, which are in the pockets of the people, you will be compelled to pay these bonds in silver if the resolution proposed becomes law.

Mr. BLAND. Are they not made by law payable in coin, silver as well as gold?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will come to that presently. But it will be practically impossible to execute this joint resolution without using the silver dollars, probably all of them, for all the surplus we have is in silver, and the Treasury Department and the administration so understand it. It is impossible to conceive any other purpose on the part of the supporters of this joint resolution; and, Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to say it will be repudiation.

I shall not enter into a technical discussion of the question whether, under law, we have not the legal right to do it. In my judgment it is in violation of the fair construction and the understood meaning of our statutes construed in the light of contemporaneous facts authorizing the creation of the debts, providing for their payment, and strengthening the public credit. Our bonds were negotiated upon the written assurances of the representatives of the Government that they should be paid in gold, and the correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury is filled with pledges to the holders of bonds that they should not be paid in "coin of less value than gold of the standard value."

In reply to a letter of Mr. BELMONT, Mr. SHERMAN said:

> As to whether Congress or the people would ever undertake to pay the principal or interest of the bonded debt, and especially the bonds since 1873, in silver, I have a firm conviction that the question will never be seriously raised. These bonds will be paid, principal and interest, in gold coin, and the United States are and always have been extremely sensitive as to the public credit. They never have, for the sake of an apparent profit, yielded to any question involving the public honor.

Was not that a pledge? And it was upon the strength of this letter, and others to which I shall refer, that the 4 percents were negotiated.

Again he wrote:

> The Government exacts in exchange for those bonds payment at their face in such gold coin.
> And it is not to be anticipated that any future legislation of Congress or any action of any Department of the Government would sanction or tolerate the redemption of these bonds by the people or the payment of the interest thereon in coin of less value than the coin authorized by law at the time of the issue of these bonds, being the coin exacted by the Government in exchange for the same.

Mr. BRUMM. Surely the gentleman from New York does not mean to say that greenbacks were not received for the bonds that were issued.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say this: that at the time when those bonds were issued the only coin known in the commerce of this country was gold. Values were measured by it and we exacted gold for the bonds and our agents pledged the Government to pay gold in return.

Mr. BRUMM. The question is whether the Government did not receive greenbacks for the bonds and whether greenbacks were not at all times receivable for those bonds.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is going into a question which I do not care to discuss at this time, and is not involved in the question under consideration. If you are correct, it only proves the Government understood its notes were payable in gold, and therefore received them as gold.

"Gold was paid for the bonds, and the creditors understood they were to be repaid in gold." The President and his Cabinet concurred in the views of the Secretary I have stated. So wrote Mr. Sherman to Mr. Belmont.

Again, the Secretary wrote, in regard to the gold and silver question referred to by Messrs. Morton, Bliss & Co.: "You have, no doubt, already received the authoritative instruction of the President and the Cabinet upon that subject, and it seems to be universally acquiesced in throughout the United States."

These declarations were previous to the extension of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds at 3½ and 3 per cent. The extensions were made when there was the limited coinage of silver and a limited supply, and at the option of the holders of the bonds they were payable. Gold only could be paid thereon then, and all trusted the extended bonds would be paid in the best money and coin of the world, and therefore so low a rate of interest was obtained. Since then every administration has maintained that principal and interest should be paid in gold—most important, yes, conclusive evidence of the understanding. That was the assumption in the markets of the world, and upon it foreign capitalists accepted the extensions. The Government, except by a new issue of bonds, could only have provided payment; and the present administration, I doubt not, regards a breach of that understanding as a disgrace to it and the country. I can conceive of none surpassing it except the destruction of our nationality, and if in one administration those plotting treason nearly effected the ruin of the country and the dissolution of the Union, in disgrace and infamy it will be approached by Mr. Cleveland's if he suffers the war debt to be paid in other than the coin expected to be paid both by creditors and the people when it was created and subsequently extended.

This thing was not done in a corner. The newspapers of the time were teeming with the discussion of this great question. New bonds could not have been negotiated or old bonds extended except for these assurances on the part of the administration as to the coin in which they would be paid.

Yes, upon the assurance of the Government that the bonds should be paid principal and interest in gold our bonds were placed upon the market at a low rate of interest. No one will undertake to say that they could have been disposed of at such advantageous rates except for the assurances given. Hardly any one will undertake to say, if it had been understood that they were payable in silver, that the increased rates would not have equaled all that would now be saved by paying them in silver. With the increase of silver the Government has faithfully undertaken to maintain an equality in value between the two coins, and the suggestion has never been made that if such equality is maintained it will not be for the advantage of the Government and the people.

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means which accompanies the joint resolution and the argument in its favor by the distinguished chairman of the committee fail to point out or even suggest a good result which will follow the disturbing of that equality which will surely come from our forcing our creditors to take silver.

It has been the policy of this Government to say to its creditors, "Gold and silver here are of equal value; take your choice; we, the United States, will pay our debts in the best money of any realm upon the round earth." And now it is proposed to force a cheapened coin upon unwilling creditors. I say, sir, the resolution is unpatriotic, is an act of repudiation, prompted and pressed, as it seems to me, from the single desire to repudiate, without any benefit to follow either to the Government or to the people.

Before this discussion is over and this question decided I trust we shall hear from gentlemen on the other side why they do this thing against the strenuous opposition of the administration they have elected and inaugurated, why they are pursuing this line of departure, why this great division in their party.

Mr. MORRISON. Is that any of your business?

Mr. HISCOCK. Ah! is that the only answer that is to be vouchsafed here by the leader of the other side? Is that the only answer which the Democratic leader advertises to the country—that why they have departed from the administration is none of our business? Why, sir, that is very nearly quoting an expression which was used most infamously once in the city of New York.

But let us look a moment into some of the immediate effects of this action, assuming that this resolution will prevail. I suppose, sir—and I invite the closest attention of the House to what I am about to say—I suppose that obligations of this country—Government, State, municipal, and other corporations—amounting to $1,250,000,000 at least, are held abroad. Where not specifically payable in gold, they will be returned to us. The foreign capitalist will no longer hold them to take the chance of the further depreciation of the metal in which they are to be paid; and the further sale of securities abroad will cease. To illustrate the risk, I invite the attention of my friends to the fact that we have coined 233,723,286 silver dollars, which cost the Government for the bullion and its coinage into dollars the sum of only $208,687,039—a saving, it has been said, of $25,000,000 to the Government. But that silver to-day, at its market value in the pockets of the people or in the vaults of the Treasury, is only worth $177,718,000. There has been a loss of over $59,000,000 upon it. You have forced out or would force out upon the people a currency which has depreciated upon their hands, and is now worth $59,366,000 less than its nominal value.

While I am making up the amount of the loss due to this legislation I will call attention to the further fact that the interest at 4 per cent. upon the average sums driven into the Treasury by the coinage of standard silver dollars and the fractional coin amounts to $40,000,000. The average amount of fractional coin driven into the Treasury for the past eight and a half months is $26,500,000. The loss in interest upon the amount at 4 per cent., if this silver had been sold as fast as it came in the Treasury, instead of having been retained there, would have made good the whole amount, and we would have $29,500,000 of assets in the Treasury available for the payment of the debt instead of a mass of silver worth at to-day's prices $17,500,000, or a loss on this item alone of $12,000,000. Silver is now worth 44⅞ pence per ounce. The silver dollar is worth 75.22 cents. If, as seems most likely, silver should fall to 40 pence per ounce, the value of the silver dollar would be 67.82 cents. And one peculiarity of the present condition of things is that the lower silver goes the greater is the amount which must be purchased; and assuming that 40 pence per ounce is to be the price, we must buy 2,280,889 ounces monthly, which will coin nearly three million standard dollars. To state this proposition is to demonstrate the absurdity of the policy. If the price should fall to 20 pence per ounce, we should issue on that basis 5,820,304 silver dollars per month. I make these statements as well to prove that the immediate effect will be an instant change of values as the return of our securities and the stopping of further sales of them abroad.

Mr. BLAND. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe I will go on in my own way.

Mr. BLAND. Have not all commodities fallen in the same way?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have once discussed that question of the fall in the price of commodities; and I pointed out that the fall of prices is not due to a contraction of our currency. I do not propose to discuss that question again to satisfy my friend from Missouri.

Yes, the cheaper silver is the more silver dollars we shall have, and the absolute destruction of our credit abroad will be inevitable. Will the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means tell me that with our obligations (if they are to be enforced here in the United States) payable in silver, those obligations can be negotiated abroad? The credit of our nation, of our States, municipalities, and other corporations has been well established abroad; yes, and under the policy of Republican administrations it has been established, and with this beneficial result that our securities, national, State, municipal, and corporate, of every kind, could be placed abroad where wealth had accumulated at a low rate of interest. The rate was reduced here and equalized with that of Europe, and money was easily obtained at low rates for the vast enterprises of our country and its development.

That credit in interest alone has saved to our people, and all classes have had the benefit of the saving, more than $1,000,000,000.

I now invite a moment's attention to another effect of the adoption of the resolution.

It was estimated January 1 last that the gold in the United States then amounted to near $627,000,000. In the year 1885, fiscal year, the gold balance in favor of the United States in our commerce with the world was over $19,000,000. That amount was added to our currency. The last fiscal year it was near $34,000,000, against us. That vast amount has been drawn from the country. How far this is due to this agitation we can not tell; but whenever you force the country to a silver basis, with the immense foreign trade which we have which must be settled in gold, with the volume of indebtedness that is held abroad which must be paid in gold, the gold currency of necessity will be withdrawn from domestic use and will be exported. I certainly can not see why, in our domestic market, the silver inflation will not be more than offset by the loss of the gold currency.

I have heard it urged that the cash assets of the Government were over $500,000,000, and that that volume of money ought not to be kept out of use. I want to say a word in reply to that suggestion. Outside of the silver dollars, practically all except $100,000,000, reserved to pay the United States notes and $70,000,000 the national-bank redemption fund, is in use with the banks and people in one form or another, and representatives in United States notes or bank circulation of those reserves are in use by them, employed by the people in trade and commerce. It is not here locked up in vaults, and the fact that it may be in part controlled by the Government in no way tends to contract our currency. Outside of gold and silver the currency that is in circulation amounts to $777,395,884. The silver is hoarded here because it can not be forced into circulation. I know that I have often heard it stated that the policy of the Government was to hoard it.

Does any one doubt the United States notes and the bank circulation will go to the Treasury for payment when it is understood the Government has parted with gold deposited there for their payment by operation of law? And every dollar to secure the payment of the United States notes is represented in circulation three for one. Do you think that circulation will remain out when it is understood there is nothing to redeem it with in the Treasury?

Why, sir, it is not that the holders of the notes and bills want coin, it is not because that they want gold, but they do want to know the coin is where they can have it and control it.

No, sir, with the exception of the $75,000,000 in silver dollars which the Treasury has been unable to force into circulation, the representatives of all the funds in the Treasury practically are out in circulation among the people.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman state by what authority that statement is made?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is the statement from the United States Treasury of June 30, 1886. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means referred to it. I think you can procure one for yourself.

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not state that the money is now in the banks, does it? It says that the money is in the Treasury.

Mr. HISCOCK. All you have to do is to analyze it and see what sums are pledged and for what they are pledged; and if you want to go a step further, then you go to the subtreasuries of the United States and find the amount of money they have, which I had occasion to do the other day in the discussion of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] for a subtreasury at Louisville. I desire to emphasize this: Go to the Treasury Department, I say to you gentlemen upon the other side of the House—they are your political friends—and analyze this statement, and you will find my assertion is true, that the representatives, either in bonds or notes of banks or in Treasury notes of the United States, some form of indebtedness or another, are out against all the balances and reserves in the Treasury except these $75,000,000 of standard silver dollars and this twenty-odd millions of subsidiary coin.

Mr. SPRINGER. I misunderstood the gentleman. I understood the gentleman to say the money which the Treasurer states as held in the Treasury for redemption was also in circulation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, there is no doubt but that the $100,000,000 is kept inviolate, but over three hundred and thirty million of United States notes are out against it. I can only read the act of 1882 as a distinct pledge that we shall not lay hands upon that $100,000,000 without being guilty of a breach of trust, of an act of impiety approaching that in the olden time of laying hands by the unsanctified upon the ark of the covenant.

Mr. MORRISON. May I ask the gentleman to read the law?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; I have it here and will read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000.

Mr. MORRISON. Now, if the $100,000,000 is pledged, as the gentleman claims, how could it fall below $100,000,000?

Mr. HISCOCK. Why, previous to that time, as I understand it, it had been the practice of the Government to retain about 40 per cent. as a reserve fund to pay its outstanding Treasury notes; and this act was passed in the light of that practice in the Treasury Department, saying in terms the Government may issue certificates up to $100,000,000, but whenever that point was reached no more representatives of the gold on hand should be issued. There is no doubt of what the understanding was at the time. The practice of the Government was understood, and was then under discussion, and it was thought that the Government retained too much; that 40 per cent. (I think that was the amount) was too large an amount, and hence the Secretary of the Treasury was directed that he might issue gold certificates upon all the gold coin and bullion in the Treasury up to $100,000,000.

That hundred million was to be set aside for the payment and redemption of these Treasury notes.

Mr. Chairman, in speaking of the silver dollars I desire to emphasize that they are not hoarded. They are here because they can not be forced into circulation. I know as I have said we have often heard it charged that the policy of the Government was to withhold them from circulation. The policy of the past administration was to get them into circulation. The last administration, as this, feared a siver basis; and I repeat that every effort on the part of that administration was put forth to get them into circulation, always looking to it that it would not do anything to so depreciate silver that it would not be regarded by the people as worth less than gold.

There was a feeling of alarm that we should be forced down to a silver basis. They appreciated the fact that that great question must be dealt with in a wise and statesmanlike manner, and if the Government depreciated its own coin the result would be to force the Government to the basis of the depreciated and dishonored currency.

Mr. Cleveland recognizes a fact and principle that seems to be beyond the comprehension or the patriotism of his party—that a government, in assuming the control of money and to affix legal-tender qualities to tokens by which debts both private and public may be discharged and the values of property in exchange and commerce be measured—undertakes to establish a standard for its people, recognized by other nations of equal enlightnment and civilization, and with whose people its people trade and mingle; that legal-tender money measures the intelligence, development, and civilization of nations, as well as their merchandise, and a government can no more afford to debase its coin than to degrade its education, religion and civilization, and his administration, so far as one can judge, absolutely fears that the country is upon the eve of repudiation, of a silver basis, and has exercised all its dowers, put forth every energy, to force silver into circulation without dishonoring it, and thus avert the calamity. It withdrew the Treasury notes of the small denominations to compel the people to take silver dollars, saying to them they should not have their choice between the silver dollar and the small Treasury notes, and their object in doing this obviously was to get rid of this volume of silver, get it into circulation, popularize it, so that it would not come back upon the Treasury, and the Government have nothing with which to pay its obligations but silver. Upon the other side you have come to recognize this fact; and the other day you put upon an appropriation bill a provision providing for the issue of silver certificates of small denominations.

Mr. BRUMM. To which you objected, I believe.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did not object to it, and the gentleman does not want to interrupt to state what is not correct.

Mr. BRUMM. I beg pardon; I so understood.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did not object, I regarded it as a questionable proceeding; and yet I thought if the effect was to get out among the people the representatives of this silver coin that is now deposited in the Treasury, so that the silver itself might remain there but pledged, that it might tend to solve the problem, that the effect of it might be to get the representative certificates of silver into circulation and defeat what I believed then and believe now is impending, the payment of our national debt in silver and the sinking to a silver basis.

I know that that legislation was criticised by people that upon this question think perhaps as I do. But I thought I could see no peril, and that possibly the advantage I have indicated might come from it. I had the power, as every other member had, of raising the point of order and having it ruled off the bill, and I forbore to do it.

Yes; I say the fact that the other day you put upon an appropriation bill legislation providing for the issue of silver certificates of small denomination proves that you recognize the fact that the silver can not itself in bulk be forced out of the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, in many other respects this question is fraught with danger, as it seems to me. At the best, sir, in adopting the pending resolution we should be trying a very doubtful experiment, one that may bring disaster and ruin to the country and the people, and one that this administration feels justified in advising against and opposing. Upon this question I believe no one doubts the patriotism of the President and the Secretary, and I must congratulate them that they follow so closely in the footsteps of their Republican predecessors. In the last Democratic national convention they had something in the nature of a pledge of this legislation which the gentleman from Illinois reported there, and I grant you that the President was elected upon that platform and upon that pledge, if it amounted to one? This resolution has been reported here by the chairman of the committee on resolutions in the national convention, I suppose in performance and fulfillment of his pledge. The President of the United States recognizes the fact that a destroyed credit, ruin and disaster to the people, and repudiation are to follow its execution, and he seeks to call a halt upon his party.

What good is to come of it? Why does not the gentleman from Illinois tell us? Who is to derive the benefit? The most that possibly can be said is that the Government will save something less than $2,000,000 a year in interest by using money which does not belong to it. Yes, that is the whole question: That you will not allow this Government to be as honest as you would exact of a trustee; that you would force this Government to use funds that do not belong to it—the bank reserves that belong to the people and the reserve pledged to pay the United States notes they hold. Have we become so beggarly and weak that the Government is compelled to employ trust funds to save a paltry amount of interest? I hope not. That is the most that can be said of the proposition.

With the exception of this seventy-five millions of silver that I hope will be got into circulation under the operation of the provision put on the sundry civil bill—with the exception of that you are not to increase the currency of the country. On the other hand it is as clear as sunlight that gold, six hundred millions and upward, is to be forced out of circulation. And that means contraction. Is it worth while for that inducement, this less than $2,000,000 of interest saved, to render possible the evil results which may follow? I say to the gentlemen upon the other side, on this great question President Cleveland is better and more patriotic than the party that elected him.

Mr. BRUMM. That is not saying much for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Illinois said that all New Yorkers were united on a question of this kind. Well, sir, New York is in favor of paying her debts, and always has been in favor of paying her debts. New York is opposed to using somebody else's money in her business. New York is opposed to using trust funds which have been solemnly pledged for particular objects in the payment of her own debts. New York is opposed to repudiation. [Applause.]

How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. HISCOCK. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McMILLIN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If no other gentleman is ready to proceed, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield me the floor.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio whatever portion of my time he may desire.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, good financial management is not all there is in good government, but good government there can not be without good financial management.

I propose in what I have to say to treat this question of surplus in the Treasury purely as a business question, regardless of any political bearing it may be supposed to have. It is a business question, a question of the management of the public finances, and as such I think it should be treated.

I have made a careful analysis of the condition of the Treasury on the 30th day of June last, as contained in the statement of assets and liabilities for that date. The result of this analysis I will give in brief. It will be seen that my statement differs slightly from the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], and I will explain further on how the difference arises.

The total cash assets in the Treasury on the 30th day of June, 1886, were $509,894,109.67. Of this $3,839,793.56 is composed of cash items, and the balance, $506,054,316.11, is composed of—

Gold, coin and bullion	$232,838,123 91
Silver	184,315,764 45
Greenbacks	41,118,316 79
National-bank notes	4,034,416 05
Deposits in banks	14,435,199 25
Subsidiary and minor coin	29,282,495 66
Total actual money in the Treasury June 30	506,054,316 11
Against this are—
Gold certificates outstanding	76,044,375 11
Silver certificates outstanding	88,116,225 00
Certificates outstanding against United States notes	18,250,000 00
Total certificates outstanding	182,410,600 00

Of course the gold, silver, and greenbacks against which certificates have been issued must be set aside and held as a trust fund to offset these certificates. Having done that, we have $323,643,716.11 left, as the fund in the Treasury over and above enough to cover all outstanding certificates. This surplus of $323,643,716.11 is in the following kinds of money:

Gold	$156,793,748 91
Standard silver dollars	96,229,539 45
Greenbacks	22,868,316 79
National-bank notes	4,034,416 05
Deposits in banks	14,435,199 25
Subsidiary coin	29,282,495 66
Total as above	323,643,716 11

But against this sum of $323,643,716.11 actual cash in the kinds of money given above are demand liabilities as follows:

Bonds called but not paid, interest due, accrued interest, &c.	$18,951,854 17
Lawful money deposited by banks to take up their circulation	60,146,726 85
Bank-note redemption fund	10,547,093 94
Checks and drafts outstanding, and other items	5,052,480 14
Total demand liabilities other than certificates	94,698,155 12

This deducted from the amount uncovered by certificates, to wit, $323,643,716.11, leaves in the Treasury in excess of all demand liabilities of every kind, except greenbacks for redemption, $228,945,560.99.

In this is included, it will be seen, the subsidiary coin, amounting to $29,282,495.66. In summing up the demand liabilities I have taken out the amount, $19,099,669.54, credited to disbursing officers and the $5,372,285.84 credited to the Post-Office account, because these sums are not in any proper sense demand liabilities. The amount placed to the credit of disbursing officers in this manner at the beginning of each month is, in fact, nothing more than a transfer on the books from one account to another. It is a fund on which disbursing officers draw in making their payments running through the month. But to offset these payments the revenues are daily coming in. If the Treasury went into liquidation on the first day of the month, or ended its business and settled up its accounts, this sum would not be a demand liability against it. There may be unsettled accounts of previous months, but that will continue to be the case as long as the Government lasts, and will always be met by receipts in the following month. I do not, therefore, count that as a demand liability, and in this is the difference between my statement and the statements of the gentleman from Illinois, to which I before referred.

This, I say, is the actual surplus over and above all demand liabilities which can be presented, except greenbacks for redemption, and I will come to that question further on.

I will now state for comparison the amount in the Treasury on the 31st of March, 1885, which was the first report after the inauguration of President Cleveland, which will show the change in the Treasury accumulation between that date and the end of the last fiscal year, on June 30, 1886:

Condition of the Treasury March 31, 1885.

Balance then in the Treasury, old form of statement		$153,813,451 93
New form of statement	53,767,403 50
	100,000,000 00
		153,767,403 50
June 30, 1886, not including disbursing officers' balances	104,473,605 61
	100,000,000 00
		204,473,605 61
Difference		50,706,202 11

This shows an increase in the actual surplus over and above all demand liabilities between the dates of March 31, 1885, and June 30, 1886, of $50,706,202.

The increase from March 31, 1885, to March 31, 1886, was $51,951,677.61.

On account of larger payments on the interest-bearing debt the surplus has slightly decreased since March 31, 1886.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us compare this surplus of $228,945,560.99, made up as I have stated, with the surplus accumulations of other countries and the amounts held to meet current liabilities by other governments. The comparison can hardly fail to strike us with astonishment. On the 16th day of June last, as given by the London Economist, the Government of England had on deposit in the Bank of England, subject, however, to demand liabilities—given in the language of the report I read from as "exchequer, savings-banks, commissioners of national debt, dividend account," &c.—£6,400,004, or a little over $30,000,000.

That was a surplus, it should be borne in mind, not in excess of the demand liabilities of the Government of England, but including its liabilities—a fund against which such liabilities were outstanding—and should be compared with our surplus of $323,000,000, against which are outstanding liabilities of $94,000,000, and not with the $228,000,000 in excess of all demand liabilities.

Mr. DINGLEY. But does the gentleman take into consideration the deposits of the Government of England in the banks of Scotland and of Ireland?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, sir. I am speaking of the public deposits in the Bank of England.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it kept deposits in the Bank of Scotland and the Bank of Ireland at the same time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If there are such deposits they are not stated, and they must be quite small. Now turn to the Bank of France. On the 18th day of June——

Mr. REED, of Maine. Why do not you give the statement of the Bank of England?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have given it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But that was the public deposits.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The private deposits are about £23,000,000 more, or altogether the deposits, including the government deposits of $30,000,000 on the day named, are a little short of £30,000,000, or $150,000,000. All but $30,000,000 of this belongs to private parties, and represents in large measure, no doubt, discounts. The Bank of England is a bank of discount, and in this great bank in the center of the great business center of the commercial world there was less than $150,000,000 of deposits on the day on which the report was made. How does this compare with our $228,000,000, against which no demands can be made, except greenbacks for redemption, and which nobody wants to have redeemed?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What is the percentage of liabilities as compared with the deposits?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The total assets in excess of the liabilities are stated as about $15,000,000.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But can you state the percentage?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have not the figures——

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman must forget that Great Britain has no demand liabilities for $346,000,000 of outstanding notes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No; but I will meet that question farther on. The bank has, however, an uncovered issue of notes, amounting now to £15,000,000; and besides that, notes issued on deposits of gold coin and bullion, substantially the same as our certificates.

Now let me pass to the Bank of France. But before doing that I will refer to a table in the London Bankers' Magazine for June, showing the surplus of the Government of Great Britain for each week during the year of 1885. I have the table here in full, but will give only the highest and lowest points of England's working surplus. The lowest was £2,779,464, or about $13,900,000; and the highest £7,870,886, or something over $39,000,000, the average being not much over $25,000,000.

And this margin between revenues and expenditures covered also daily demand liabilities. Indeed that is what the surplus of a government is for, and it serves no other good purpose.

I turn now to the Bank of France. On the 18th of June last, and I quote again from the London Economist, the Government of France had on deposit to its credit in the Bank of France £4,259,000, or $21,295,000. Here is a government which collects and expends over $600,000,000 annually with a fund to come and go on of a little over $21,000,000, and that not in excess of its daily demand liabilities, but a fund out of which such liabilities must be met. How does this compare with our enormous idle surplus of $223,000,000? France has subsidiary silver, too, and so has England. But I do not see it put down as "unavailable."

The Bank of France has besides, notes outstanding $501,855,000, with gold on deposit, $276,110,000; silver, $225,465,000; but the discounts of this bank are immense, reaching to hundreds of millions in a year. And it is worthy of note here that the Government deposits of other countries are kept with banks, and to a certain extent, therefore, may be loaned out the same as other deposits.

Take next for comparison the Imperial Bank of Germany. The total deposits, including the public deposits, were on the 7th of June only £13,000,000, and if we assume—the public deposits not being given—that the public deposits bear the same proportion as in France and England, it would give about $12,500,000 as the surplus margin of the imperial government. And so you may go all through the several countries of Europe, comparing in the same manner, and you will find that the government deposits, which include requirements for demand liabilities, do not reach one-half of the surplus in our Treasury over and above demand liabilities.

Mr. McKINLEY. Has my colleague compared these figures so as to give the percentage of the deposits as compared with the demand obligations of the several governments?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The demand obligations are not given.

Mr. McKINLEY. I was in hopes you might have had the percentages among your notes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have not. I do not know of any data accessible that would give that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly; but I have very little time left, I fear.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will yield the gentleman from my own time if necessary.

This balance, as I understand it, reports what they have on deposit over against their notes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, not against notes at all. Notes are not included. The British Government issues no notes nor does the Government of France. The German Empire does, but keeps no special reserve against them, that is no coin reserve as against the notes. The paper, the state paper money of the empire, is legal tender and is issued by the imperial government, but against it neither the government nor the bank is required to hold a coin reserve. The amount, however, is rigidly limited. The bank also issues notes as does the Bank of England, and beyond a certain amount gold or silver must be deposited against them. The uncovered issues of the Bank of England are now $75,000,000, and all other banks have about the same amount. Against these no gold or silver is held either by the bank or the government. I have a table here giving the exact amount of uncovered notes authorized by the act of 1844, which I will include with my remarks. The table is as follows:

Amounts authorized by the acts of 1844 and 1845:

England:
Bank of England	£14,000,000
Two hundred and seven private banks	5,153,407
Seventy-two joint-stock banks	3,495,446
Scotland, twelve joint-stock banks	3,087,209
Ireland, six joint-stock banks	6,354,494
	32,090,556

Equal to about $160,453,780.

Mr. PAYSON. Let me ask what point is made by the gentleman in citing these figures in this connection?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They have nothing whatever to do with the question of surplus, except as it bears on the $100,000,000 held in the Treasury for the redemption of greenbacks.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. As I understand the gentleman, these balances do not represent any provision made for demand indebtedness?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The surplus of the countries I have named covers the demand liabilities of the several countries, but has nothing to do with note issues, except in Germany; and there the surplus is not specifically for the redemption of its paper money.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then it represents these two heads: it is a provision for demand liabilities on the one hand, and what we may call a working balance on the other.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It represents liabilities, as I have stated, but has nothing to do with the circulation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Am I right in the construction I gave to your view? I ask you because I wish to understand it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman will repeat his question I will listen more attentively.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This balance, then, represents the provision they make for meeting their demand liabilities, and also for providing what we call a working balance?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is it exactly, and it could not be stated better than the gentleman has stated it. It corresponds to our $323,000,000 against which are $94,000,000 demand liabilities, the rest being pure surplus. I venture to say if we could go through the treasuries of the world we would find that the accumulations made by all the nations of the earth do not equal the surplus now in the Treasury of the United States. And I go further and say that such an accumulation was never made before anywhere in ancient or modern times. There is no record of any such accumulation of treasure in any place, in any country, at any period of the world's history. The fabled treasure at Delphi or the wealth of Crœsus sinks into insignificance in comparison with the accumulations of our Treasury. The spoils of no conqueror ever equaled the money stored in our Treasury now.

This $228,000,000 is nearly as much as all the revenues amounted to for the first twenty-five years of this Government, which was but $246,000,000; it is four times the amount of money paid for all the territory purchased by the United States. Florida, Louisiana, New Mexico, California, and Alaska all together cost but $57,000,000. This accumulation is equal to the immediate cost of the first three wars of the United States—the war of the Revolution, the war of 1812, and the Mexican war. It is more than one-half of the entire volume of money in the United States in 1861.

The money in the Treasury to-day is twenty-five millions more than all the money in the United States in 1861, gold, silver, and bank notes altogether. The entire volume of money in the United States in 1861 was only $485,000,000; some authorities make it less. Of this, $202,000,000 were bank notes and $85,000,000 coin reserves. How have we accumulated this enormous fund? By taxation. The excess has been gathered from the people and applied to no use but is kept locked up, there to remain in idle heaps. Here is a reservoir, the Treasury, into which $335,000,000 flow, while the outflow is but $290,000,000, resulting in a yearly surplus of $40,000,000 to $50,000,000. Yet, with revenue coming in forty-five millions in excess of expenditure, it is claimed that we must keep a large balance in the Treasury as a sort of working balance.

Below I give a statement of revenues and expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WARRANT DIVISION, July 6, 1886.

Tois table shows an excess of revenues over expenses of $45,977,502.13.

I come now to the $100,000,000 set apart for the redemption of greenbacks. The joint resolution of 1869 pledged the faith of the Government to the redemption of United States notes in coin. The act of 1875 provided for the resumption of specie payments in 1879. The act of May 31, 1878, provided that greenbacks when redeemed should not thereafter be canceled, but should be paid out again and kept in circulation. It is now claimed that a reserve of $100,000,000 is necessary to secure the convertibility of this currency. To that question I wish especially to call attention for a few minutes. Is it necessary in order to maintain the convertibility of the greenback circulation, or to secure its equivalency with coin, to maintain untouched a hundred million of dollars? If it were really necessary to keep such a reserve I would not touch it. If it were necessary to secure absolute equivalency of paper and coin to increase this fund I would increase it. But I do not believe it necessary to keep $100,000,000 or $50,000,000 or $25,000,000 even for that purpose. Nobody wants greensbacks redeemed, and you will find that gold goes ten times for greenbacks where greenbacks go once for coin.

I give below a table showing how many greenbacks have been presented nominally for redemption in coin since the redemption act went into effect in 1879. Occasionally a man wants coin, and if he chances to have greenbacks takes that way to get it, and a small fund may be needed for such conversions, but that is all.

UNITED STATES TREASURER'S OFFICE, February 24, 1886.

The Treasurer is careful to state that the redemption has been made in gold coin. But there is nothing in the law pledging redemption in gold. The acts of 1869 and 1875 say "coin." The act of July 12, 1882, provides only that the issue of gold certificates shall be suspended "whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000." But because at one time gold was gathered under the option contained in the acts providing for the issue of the notes in the first instance, and more specifically in the acts of 1869, and the resumption act of 1875, to redeem in coin of either metal, is the Government precluded thereafter from exercising the option to substitute silver coin or to reduce the reserve fund if it deemed so large a sum no longer necessary? Nobody would seriously claim that. Such a claim would be absurd. Greenbacks are redeemable in coin, but not necessarily in gold coin.

But why do I say a reserve of $100,000,000 is not necessary to maintain the convertibility of greenbacks? Because of this principle, which is well settled in monetary science, and which was clearly laid down and acted upon in the British act of 1844. And what is that principle? Briefly stated it is this: First, if the paper money of a country, being legal tender issued by the Government, as are our greenbacks, be, in the first place, less in amount than is that country's distributive share of the world's money, then it can not depreciate or fall below the level of value of the world's money. If a cistern but partly filled with water is connected with another in which the water stands higher an equilibrium will be established. So it is with the distribution of the world's money. There is a tendency always to an equilibrium. Second, if the paper being convertible be a less part of their whole currency than the people choose to have in the form of paper rather than in the form of coin, then it will not go to the Treasury, or to any place of redemption, to be redeemed, except in very small sums to supply specific wants, and a small reserve in that case is sufficient to maintain convertibility. It may be stated in this connection also that a convertible currency composed of part coin and part paper is subject to the same law of regulation that governs a purely metallic currency. This is the foundation principle of the British act of 1844, established after a thorough and prolonged discussion lasting for over half a century and participated in by as able economists as have ever lived or written on this subject.

But to have this principle stated better than I can do it myself, I will read what one of the ablest expounders of this bank act has said about it. Colonel Torrens, discussing this question and laying down the principle upon which the act of 1844 was founded, says:

This act was framed in accordance with the principles established by Dr. Adam Smith, Mr. Ricardo, Mr. Loyd, and Mr. Norman.

He might have added McCulloch, Mill, and others equally eminent.

The opponents of that measure could not consistently object to its provisions without controverting doctrines which had been previously received as the demonstrated truths of monetary science.

These principles he goes on to state, as follows:

First. That the amount of a strictly convertible currency, which it is practicable to maintain, is determined, not by legislative enactments or by banking regulations, but by the natural law of equilibrium by which the precious metals are distributed throughout the countries of the world.

Second. That when from any temporary cause the amount of a mixed currency of coin and convertible notes exceeds the amount determined by the law of equilibrium, the level is restored by the return of a portion of the note circulation upon the issuers, in exchange for specie.

Third. That when from any temporary cause the amount of a mixed currency of coin and convertible paper falls short of the amount determined by the law of equilibrium, the ordinary level is restored by an influx of the precious metals. From these principles it follows, as a necessary corollary, that when that portion of the note circulation which may be issued upon securities is fixed below the amount to which under the law of equilibrium the currency must conform, that portion of the bank-note circulation will not be returned upon the issuers in exchange for treasure.

* * * * * * *

Such being the principles upon which the act was founded, it became incumbent upon those who were concerned in framing it to ascertain by a careful reference to past experience the minimum amount below which in recent times the circulation of the Bank of England had never been reduced.

* * * * * * *

Upon these grounds the framers of the act assumed that under a separation of functions the minimum amount below which the notes out of the issue department could not be reduced under the action of the foreign exchanges, was £16,732,000; that if £14,000,000 were permitted under the provisions of the act to be issued without a corresponding reserve of bullion the minimum amount which would be required to be issued against bullion held in deposits would be £2,730,000; and that as the reserve of bullion could not under such circumstances be ever reduced below £2,730,000, the convertibility of the circulation would be secured.

The correctness of these views have been fully borne out by experience. Theory has been verified by fact. In so far as regards the perfect convertibility of the circulation the anticipations of the framers of the act have been realized.

The volume of paper. when the people of England were left free to choose between paper and coin, had never fallen below the sum set apart in the act and they said it never would, and it never has.

They therefore took the sum of £14,000,000 and made it a fixed quantity requiring no reserve against these notes—uncovered issues, as they are called. Besides this £14,000,000 of Bank of England notes the extant issues of other banks were treated in the same way. At that time there were altogether, as I have shown, about $160,000,000 in Great Britain treated in the same way, as uncovered issues. Sir Robert Peel drew the line so as to take in the notes then in circulation but no more. It was a less amount, he said, than that country would always want in the form of paper. If more paper was wanted, gold and silver must be deposited dollar for dollar against it. That is exactly the condition of our paper circulation now. The greenback volume of $346,000,000 is a smaller part of our whole volume of money than the people will always choose to have in the form of paper, and it can not fall below the level of coin money, nor will it flow back upon the Treasury for coin redemption. It is less than the country will always want in the form of paper, as proved by long experience. It is safe, therefore, to leave this volume of uncovered currency. But if the people want any larger part of their currency in the form of paper, let them deposit gold and silver to get it. That, I repeat, is the principle of the act of 1844. It has proved a safe principle there, and it is a safe principle to rely on here. It is a principle, too, that has been adopted by nearly every government in Europe.

We say, first, this three hundred and forty-six millions is not a fourth part of the entire volume of money in the country; it is not a fourth part of our distributive share of the world's money. Secondly, we say it is far less than the people will always want in the form of paper. Therefore, if we draw a line around this volume and say there shall be no more unless it be to take the place of other paper or other kinds of money, it can not possibly become depreciated.

In adopting a paper circulation—

Says Lord Overstone—

we must unavoidably depend for a maintenance of its due value upon the adoption of a strict and judicious rule for the regulation of its amount.

In no other way in fact can its value be maintained. This is the reason why I do not believe it necessary to keep a reserve of one hundred millions of coin in the Treasury for the redemption of greenbacks. Besides, the authority to sell bonds bearing interest at 4, 4½, or 5 per cent. still continues. Is not that enough without a $100,000,000 in hand?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] give us his judgment of the effect upon the payment of silver?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will come to that.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I saw that the gentleman was getting near the end of his time, and I was afraid that he might omit that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will speak of that. It is an important point; but first let me refer to the debt. The interest-bearing debt on March 31, 1885, as given in the first report after President Cleveland took office, was $1,246,743,112, including the Pacific Railroad debt but not the Navy pension fund of $14,000,000, which is a permanent trust. On June 30, 1886, the debt was $1,196,637,612, which shows that between March 31, 1885 and June 30, 1886, $50,135,500 of the debt was paid and no more. The public press has stated that the public debt has been reduced by a hundred millions during the last fiscal year. That is not correct. The error lies in counting the increased accumulation of money in the Treasury as a payment on the debt. When it is applied to the debt it will be a payment on the debt, but not until then.

The actual payment was in round numbers $50,000,000, but it is proper to say that during the first twelve months of this administration, while we increased the surplus $52,000,000, there was only $20,091,650 paid on the interest-bearing debt. There has been $30,000,000 paid since March, 1886. I will give these figures in tabular form for convenience:

Interest-bearing debt, March 31, 1886, including Pacific Railroad bonds, but not the Navy pension fund	$1,246,773,112
The same June 30, 1886	1,196,637,612
Amount paid	50,135,500
Paid between March 31, 1885, and March 31, 1886	20,091,650
Paid between March 31, 1886, and June 30, 1886	30,043,850

The 3 per cent. bonds outstanding subject to call June 30, 1886, were $144,146,600. This is part of the debt it is now proposed to apply the surplus to.

Look a moment at the situation presented here: A surplus in the Treasury over and above all demand liabilities, besides the subsidiary silver, of nearly $200,000,000, and a debt outstanding on which we are paying interest, subject to call, of $144,000,000! What would any business man do with money in hand and a debt bearing interest that he could pay and stop the interest? Would he manage his own affairs as public affairs have been and are being managed? He would be deemed a fit subject for an asylum if he should. No, sir; it is not good financial management to lock up the revenues and leave a debt outstanding bearing interest.

It has, moreover, been the fixed policy of this country from the foundation of the Government down to pay off and extinguish in time of peace debts created in time of war. This is so important a subject that I will quote from some of the messages of the earlier Presidents.

In almost every message sent to Congress from Washington to Jackson attention was called to the public debt and to the importance of its early extinguishment. But I will let the messages speak for themselves.

In Washington's second annual message he says:

Allow me, moreover, to hope that it will be a favorite policy with you, not merely to secure a payment of the interest of the debt funded, but as far and as fast as the growing resources of the country will permit to exonerate it of the principal itself.

In his third annual message he urged the application of the proceeds from the sale of public lands, first, to the interest, then to the principal of the public debt. In his fourth annual message he says:

I entertain a strong hope that the state of the national finances is now sufficiently matured to enable you to enter upon a systematic and effectual arrangement for the regular redemption and discharge of the public debt, according to the right which has been reserved to the Government. No measure can be more desirable, whether viewed with an eye to its intrinsic importance or to the general sentiment and wish of the nation.

Again, in his fifth annual message, he says:

No pecuniary consideration is more urgent than the regular redemption and discharge of the public debt. On none can delay be more injurious, or an economy of time more valuable.

In his sixth he says again:

The time which has elapsed since the commencement of our fiscal measures has developed our pecuniary resources so as to open the way for a definite plan for the redemption of the public debt. It is believed that the result is such as to encourage Congress to consummate this work without delay. Nothing can more promote the permanent welfare of the nation, and nothing would be more grateful to our constituents. Indeed, whatever is unfinished of our system of public credit can not be benefited by procrastination; and, as far as may be practicable, we ought to place that credit on grounds which can not be disturbed, and to prevent that progressive accumulation of debt which must ultimately endanger all governments.

Then in his seventh message he says:

Whether measures may not be advisable to re-enforce the provision for the redemption of the public debt will naturally engage your examination. Congress have demonstrated their sense to be, and it were superfluous to repeat mine, that whatsoever will tend to accelerate the honorable extinction of our public debt accords as much with the true interests of our country as with the general sense of our constituents.

In his eighth message, after referring to the public debt, he says:

Posterity may have cause to regret if from any motive intervals of tranquillity are left unimproved for accelerating this valuable end.

This is good reading at this time.

In John Adams's first message to Congress, referring to the importance of the early extinction of the public debt, he says:

The consequences arising from the continual accumulation of public debts in other countries ought to admonish us to be careful to prevent their growth in our own.

In three other messages Mr. Adams pressed upon Congress the importance of provisions for the payment of the Revolutionary debt.

But of all the early Presidents no one more persistently in his writings and messages pressed upon Congress the importance of the early extinction of the national debt than Thomas Jefferson.

In his second annual message, Mr. Jefferson says:

When effects so salutary result from the plans you have already sanctioned, when merely by avoiding false objects of expense we are able, without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing, to make large and effectual payments toward the discharge of our public debt and the emancipation of our posterity from that moral canker, it is an encouragement, fellow-citizens, of the highest order, to proceed as we have begun in substituting economy for taxation, and in pursuing what is useful for a nation placed as we are, rather than what is practiced by others under different circumstances. In the mean time, by payments of the principal of our debt, we are liberating, annually, portions of the external taxes, and forming from them a growing fund still further to lessen the necessity of recurring to extraordinary resources.

Mr. Tilden, in one of his papers, published in the first volume of his writings and speeches, illustrating the influence of debt upon the laboring classes, quotes Jefferson as saying:

"A public debt," to use the strong language of a true patriot, "is a calamity and a curse, and a perpetual blight upon honest industry and productive labor."

* * * * * * *

And again:

"The Federalists of our time," said he, "look to a single and splendid government, founded on banking institutions and moneyed incorporations, riding and ruling over the plundered plowman and beggared yeomanry."

Mr. Madison also repeatedly called the attention of Congress to the public debt and urged its early and effectual extinction. In his seventh annual message he states the debts then outstanding after the close of the war of 1812. And in his eighth annual message he uses the following language:

In directing the legislative attention to the state of the finances, it is a subject of great gratification to find that even within the short period which has elapsed since the return of peace the revenue has far exceeded all the current demands upon the Treasury, and that, under any probable diminution of its future annual product, which the vicissitudes of commerce may occasion, it will afford an ample fund for the effectual and early extinguishment of the public debt.

President Monroe, referring to the public debt still existing, says:

Estimating, then, the whole amount of the public debt at $79,000,000, and regarding the annual receipts and expenditures of the Government, a well-founded hope may be entertained that should no unexpected event occur the whole of the public debt may be discharged in the course of ten years, and the Government be left at liberty thereafter to apply such portion of the revenue as may not be necessary for current expenses to such other objects as may be most conducive to the public security and welfare.

Following Monroe John Q. Adams in his third annual message refers to the debt in the following language:

The deep solicitude felt by our citizens of all classes throughout the Union for the total discharge of the public debt, will apologize for the earnestness with which I deem it my duty to urge this topic upon the consideration of Congress; of recommending to them again the observance of the strictest economy in the public funds.

Next to Jefferson, however, Jackson most persistently urged as a Democratic measure the complete and final extinction of the national debt. In his first annual message he says:

The management of the public revenue—that searching operation of all governments—is among the most delicate and important trusts of ours; and it will, of course, demand no inconsiderable share of my official solicitude. Under every aspect in which it can be considered it would appear that advantage must result from the observance of a strict and faithful economy. This I shall aim at the more anxiously, both because it will facilitate the extinguishment of the national debt, the unnecessary duration of which is incompatible with real independence, and because it will counteract that tendency to public and private profligacy which a profuse expenditure of money by the Government is but too apt to engender.

In his third annual message he held out the hope of the complete extinction of the debt during his administration, adding the memorable words:

We shall then exhibit the rare example of a great nation, abounding in all the means of happiness and security, altogether free from debt.

In his fourth annual message, December 4, 1832, he said again:

I can not too cordially congratulate Congress and my fellow-citizens on the near approach of that memorable and happy event, the extinction of the public debt of this great and free nation. Faithful to the wise and patriotic policy marked out by the Legislature of the country for this object, the present administration has devoted to it all the means which a flourishing commerce has supplied, and a prudent economy preserved for the public Treasury. Within the four years for which the people have confided the executive power to my charge, forty-eight millions of dollars will have been applied to the payment of the public debt.

Forty-eight million dollars then was harder to pay than five times $48,000,000 now.

In 1833 he said again:

From this view of the state of the finances, and the public engagements yet to be fulfilled, you will perceive that, if Providence permits me to meet you at another session, I shall have the high gratification of announcing to you that the national debt is extinguished. I can not refrain from expressing the pleasure I feel at the near approach of that desirable event. The short period of time within which the public debt will have been discharged is strong evidence of the abundant resources of the country, and of the prudence and economy with which the Government has heretofore been administered. We have waged two wars since we became a nation with one of the most powerful kingdoms in the world; both of them undertaken in defense of our dearest rights—both successfully prosecuted and honorably terminated; and many of those who partook in the first struggle, as well as the second, will have lived to see the last item of the debt incurred in these necessary but expensive conflicts faithfully and honestly discharged.

Finally, in 1835, he sent to Congress the welcome announcement that—

Since my last annual communication all the remains of the public debt have been redeemed, or money has been placed in deposit for this purpose, whenever the creditors choose to receive it.

Again, in his last annual message, he said:

The experience of other nations admonish us to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt; but it will be in vain that we have congratulated each other upon the disappearance of this evil if we do not guard against the equally great one of promoting the unnecessary accumulation of public revenue.

I commend these words of wisdom to the consideration of the present administration.

Again, Mr. Polk, in his first annual message, in 1845, said:

A few years ago our whole national debt, growing out of the Revolution and the war of 1812 with Great Britain, was extinguished, and we presented to the world the rare and noble spectacle of a great and growing people who had fully discharged every obligation. Since that time the existing debt has been contracted, and small as it is in comparison with the similar burdens of most other nations, it should be extinguished at the earliest practicable period. Should the state of the country permit, and especially if our foreign relations interpose no obstacle, it is contemplated to apply all the moneys in the Treasury as they accrue, beyond what is required for the appropriations by Congress, to its liquidation. I cherish the hope of soon being able to congratulate the country on its recovering once more the lofty position which it so recently occupied. Our country, which exhibits to the world the benefits of self-government in developing all the sources of national prosperity, owes to mankind the permanent example of a nation free from the blighting influence of a public debt.

Again, in 1848, he says:

Though our debt, as compared with that of most other nations, is small, it is our true policy and in harmony with the genius of our institutions that we should present to the world the rare spectacle of a great republic, possessing vast resources and wealth, wholly exempt from public indebtedness. This would add still more to our strength and give to us a still more commanding position among the other nations of the earth.

And again, in the same message, he says:

A public debt of more than $120,000,000 existed, and it is not to be disguised that many of the authors of the new system did not regard its speedy payment as essential to the public prosperity, but looked upon its continuance as no national evil.

That is the way our debt, ten times greater than in the time of Mr. Polk, is now looked upon by many; but the policy of the fathers as reflected in all the messages of the early Presidents is eminently sound and wise, and I commend it to this Congress and to this Democratic administration. It will be an evil day when that policy is changed for one that will fasten upon us the Old-World policy of a permanent and ever increasing national debt. A permanent debt and a republican government can not long exist together. I would like to see the day come when this country shall stand forth the model republic of the world, able to boast that in one generation it paid the expenses of the most costly war of modern times, and left no entailed debt to burden posterity forever. Away with the nonsense that a national debt is a national blessing!

Now, as to the effect on silver to which the gentleman from Maine refers. Every body will agree, I think, that all the money in the Treasury is now of equal value. A dollar in silver is equal in value to a dollar in gold or in paper, and a dollar in paper equal to a dollar in coin, gold or silver. One dollar will buy as much of anything anywhere in the country as another will, and that is really the only test. The value of a coin as money does not depend entirely upon the value for other purposes of the material out of which the coin is made, but upon another law which I have but barely touched upon. Now, how will the payment of the surplus on the debt change the relative value of the several kinds of money? There will be less then in the Treasury and more outside, but the respective volumes of each will not be changed; and if the volume be not changed it is not easy to see how the value of either class of money is to be changed. It is claimed, I know, that if this money in the Treasury is paid out it will reduce the value of all the money in the country to the level of silver bullion. Let us see if that can possibly be the effect? In the first place there are over $250,000,000 of gold and silver in the Treasury uncovered by certificates. There are over $156,000,000 of gold uncovered by certificates, and $56,000,000 in excess of the $100,000,000 so-called reserve. There are $92,000,000 in gold, greenbacks, and in deposits in banks, besides the silver and the hundred millions for the redemption of greenbacks. There is, therefore, $92,000,000 available in the Treasury without touching the silver; so that if there were any law or any good reason for not paying out the silver on the bonds, there is no necessity for doing so.

The silver can be paid out on anything else, although there is no good reason why any discrimination should be made. But suppose silver is paid out, will it change the relative value of the coins of the two metals, or the relative value of coin and paper? How can it? What difference can it make whether the money is in the Treasury or somewhere else? The proportion of each kind is not changed. I say it is impossible for the silver and the paper together in this country, with the volume limited as it is, to fall below the level of gold. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] says that as the volume becomes larger the lower prices fall. That is, the more dollars there are the more each one will buy!

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to say distinctly that I did not mean that, and that I will correct the statement in my printed remarks.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wonder that the gentleman desires to correct that statement.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did not mean any such thing. Wait a moment. I want to say distinctly I shall correct that statement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wonder that the gentleman wishes to correct it. It ought to be corrected.

Now, let us see how much of paper and of silver together there is in the country. There is outstanding in round numbers $248,000,000 of bank paper, less the lawful money deposited for its redemption, and $346,000,000 of greenbacks; so that altogether there is less than $600,000,000 of paper; and there is, say, $300,000,000 of silver. Thus there would be $900,000,000 of money remaining after the $600,000,000 of gold had been expelled from the country as the gentleman from New York says it will be. Yet according to the view expressed by the gentleman each dollar of the $900,000,000 left would be worth a great deal less than a dollar of a volume of $1,500,000,000! In my view directly the opposite of this would be true. You can not reduce the volume of money and at the same time diminish the purchasing power of each dollar. The purchasing power will necessarily be increased.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not desire or intend to be misrepresented on this question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I certainly would not intentionally misrepresent the gentleman.

Mr. HISCOCK. The remark to which the gentleman alludes was an inadvertence, and I shall take occasion to correct it in revising the manuscript of my speech.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very well; if the gentleman did not say what he intended to say, I will of course take back my criticism. What I say is that $900,000,000 of money can not have in the same country less value per unit than $1,500,000,000. A dollar of a volume of $900,000,000 can not have less value but must have greater purchasing power than a dollar of a volume of $1,500,000,000. Supposing, then, that gold should be expelled from the country, it is impossible, I say, that the money which remains should be reduced in value. The result would be directly the opposite, and for that reason gold will not be expelled. A little may go, but it can not go in such quantity as to materially reduce the entire money volume here without increasing, not decreasing, the value of what is left and under such circumstances gold never leaves a country. It goes to such countries. Gold will leave us only when the volume of money other than gold has been first so increased as to depreciate it and raise prices above the gold or international level of prices.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Did not the Treasury Department some time ago enter into a transaction by which the gold reserve was increased?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gold reserve has been increased above what it was on the 31st of March, 1885.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And do you criticise the action of the Treasury Department in that respect?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I certainly do in this respect.

Mr. REAGAN. The gold reserve has been steadily increasing for years.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, it has been increasing; but I do not think that policy a wise one, and I will tell you why.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Was not the motive of the Treasury Department, as announced, in thus increasing the gold reserve, to avoid a silver basis?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have no right to consider motives. The Treasury Department has seemed to be under the impression that if this money were paid out we would come to the level of the bullion value of silver—to me an absurd proposition—a thing which I maintain can not possibly take place without we first greatly enlarge the volume of silver or paper or both, whatever may be the opinion of the Treasury officials. Such a result would be in violation of all known laws of economic science.

Now, I ask again, for what is this $228,000,000 kept in the Treasury? In whose interest is it kept there? I can understand how an idolatrous superstition could gather millions of talents in a heathen temple to purchase the favor of the gods; but why should we hoard $228,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States? Is it to purchase the favor of Wall street and the banks? If so, it is altogether too dear a price.

Surely this vast sum wrung by taxes from the people is not kept in the Treasury in the interest of the sixty million of people? No. It is in the interest of sixty thousand, perhaps, as against sixty million—the sixty thousand who hold these bonds and do not want them paid, or who do not want the bank circulation disturbed—their interests may be subserved by holding on to this surplus; they think there is already too much money, because interest is low. Interest always is and always will be low with a shrinking volume of money and falling prices, because then the only thing at once safe and profitable to hold is money. Money is "cheap" if one wants to borrow and has Government bonds for collateral, but if one wants to buy money, exchange commodities or other property for it, he finds money dear enough then. But I have no time to discuss these questions now.

Mr. Chairman, the policy of a government may have the widest influence upon the prosperity of a people. We try to economize in small sums—a hundred dollars, a thousand dollars—and I believe in economy and frugality in the management of every department of Government; but by a bad financial policy a government may lose or cause the loss of more in one day than can be saved in a year by the most economical methods in expenditure. By collecting money through taxation and locking it up in the Treasury, you take away the very instruments of trade and commerce—the very means first of all necessary for healthful production. By extracting from the channels of circulation money necessary for the support of industries you prevent the employment not of a hundred thousand merely, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, but of a million of people; and the total production of the country is in my judgment cut short from this very cause not by $100,000,000 but by $1,000,000,000, or possibly by $1,500,000,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. I take the floor, and yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, as I have interrupted him.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Maine for his courtesy.

I say that by a bad financial policy you can cause a loss to the country compared with which what you can save by economy in administration sinks into insignificance. The loss is not measured by the taxation or the amount of money hoarded in the Treasury, but by diminished production, less regular employment of labor, retarded accumulation of wealth, and with all this lessened ability to pay debts and taxes. That is the trouble now. Fifty millions more in wages for labor a month would mean two billions increase in the total productions of the country. This is the necessary effect of contraction and overtaxation.

Hence, Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to say that a policy which gathers into the Treasury every year $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 more than is paid out is a policy which, if persisted in, will wreck any administration or any party. The people of this country will not submit always to a policy of that kind; and they ought not to submit to it. Why should they? Such a policy pursued in the past had more to do with putting the Republican party out of power than any other cause, and it will so operate with any party.

There is another point which I deem of great importance in this connection. There were outstanding on the 30th day of June last $144,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds. Four millions had, however, I believe, been called; possibly eight up to this time have been called.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Four millions on the 1st of July.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Of these bonds about $107,000,000, owned by the banks, are deposited to secure their circulation, and eight millions more to secure deposits?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If it is of any value to the gentleman from Ohio, I have the statement of the Treasurer this morning, showing there are now outstanding $147,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds, of which but $4,000,000 have been called.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That comes down to a later date than the statement which I have followed. Now, to the extent the banks may determine to surrender circulation rather than deposit other bonds, there will be a contraction of the bank-note circulation, and, no doubt, as these bonds are paid banks will surrender a part at least, and some perhaps all of their circulation. A bank which has, for instance, a circulation of $200,000 will, very likely, surrender all but $50,000, which will enable it to continue as a national bank. The money to redeem the bonds is now in the Treasury, and the bonds are there too. The money, therefore, will not go out of the Treasury at all except in excess of the bank notes to be retired. This will result in a further contraction of the national-bank circulation, and this question of contraction of the currency has already become a serious one. Fifty millions have been accumulated in the Treasury, which operates virtually as a contraction. Then there has been an actual cancellation of $9,939,677 of bank notes. The increase in the deposit of lawful money against outstanding bank notes has been $22,500,737, making an actual contraction of bank notes of $32,430,414, and a total contraction of nearly $85,000,000 during the past year. Against this there is the silver coinage of about $30,000,000. There has been, therefore, an actual contraction of the currency volume during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, of about $55,000,000, while the increase of population has called for an increase, to keep up the same proportion between circulation and population as existed at the beginning of the year, of at least $45,000,000. So that with an actual contraction during the last fiscal year of $55,000,000 it will be seen that we stand to-day, as compared with our situation one year ago, with $100,000,000 less money relatively to population than we had then.

Why, sir, the fall of prices but answers to this contraction in the effective money volume. With a further contraction prices will go lower still, necessarily. Each dollar of a smaller volume will buy more. More must be given for a dollar. As fifteen people in a family require more bread and meat than ten, so more money is required for fifteen than for ten people. With less and less money prices will go lower and lower. No other result is possible, and there must be an end to this contraction and swallowing up of the money of the country some time; and the sooner the better.

And that is the reason I have offered the amendment, which has been read, and which is as follows:

Provided, That after the passage of this act whenever and as fast as the circulating notes of national banks are redeemed or canceled as provided by the act of June 3, 1864, and amendments thereto, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued in place of such bank notes redeemed, dollar for dollar, United States notes in denominations as nearly as may be of the bank notes redeemed, and all laws applicable to United States notes now in circulation are hereby made applicable to notes issued under this act.

It is the purpose of this amendment to prevent further contraction of the money volume. As bank notes are retired it is proposed that United States notes—dollar for dollar—shall be issued in their place. It is not inflation; it would simply stop contraction and secure stability. And, gentlemen, let me tell you we can not continue the policy of changing from gold and silver to gold alone, and at the same time reduce the volume of paper money, without serious consequences.

This policy of contraction, as surely as it is followed, will bring ruin in its train. The only bankrupt law we will want, after this policy is pursued a year or two longer, will be a sponge law.

With a shrinking volume of money and falling prices men do not go into business. Nothing yields profit. Labor finds less and less employment; times grow harder and harder; debtors are made bankrupts. The value of money is increased, but just as many dollars are required to pay a debt, and that is the "honest" dollar we hear so much about. Why not take an honest way to make an "honest" dollar, that is, increase the weight of gold in it. If the weight of gold dollars were doubled there could be but half as many dollars as now. Would such dollars be "honest" dollars? But if the number of dollars be reduced one-half in any other way the effect on the value of each dollar would be the same. How is one way any more honest than the other? The honest dollar is the dollar that has the same value—purchasing power—when one parts with it as when he received it. The honest dollar is the one which has the same value when a man pays a debt as when he contracted it; the same when he receives payment as when he made a loan. Alter not the value of money if you would obey the commandment not to steal.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You were going on to explain your amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The object of the amendment is to prevent as far as possible the contraction which is going on and which is certain to become permanent if the resolution before us passes. I wish to keep the volume of paper circulation just where it is now—no inflation and no contraction. When a five-dollar bank note is canceled I want to have issued in its place a five-dollar United States note, thus keeping the volume of paper currency, as I have said, just what it now is, which is altogether, greenbacks and national-bank notes, about $600,000,000. The effect on prices and business of canceling $50,000,000 of note circulation will be precisely the same as the loss of $50,000,000 of gold or silver. The British Parliament in 1844 passed an act to make permanent the paper currency then in existence in order to give greater stability to their money system. I want to do the same by preventing further contraction of our volume of paper, and then I propose to go further and do what Gladstone, in a recent speech on the Irish government, favors:

Ireland might think fit to pass a law providing for the extinction of private issues in Ireland, and that no bank notes should be issued in Ireland, except under the authority and for the advantage of the state. I own it is my opinion that Ireland would do an extremely sensible thing if she passed such a law. [Hear, hear.] It is my most strong and decided opinion that we ought to have the same law ourselves [cheers], but the block of business has prevented that and many other good things toward the attainment of which I hope we are now going to open the door.

This is the position I take and this is the aim of my amendment. A prominent daily paper in commenting on this part of Gladstone's speech said:

In this country, too, we shall ultimately have to take a similar course. The national-bank notes will have to be suppressed as other bank notes have been suppressed, and their place supplied by greenbacks.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What is your plan with reference to the one hundred and forty millions of 3 per cent. bonds after they are paid off?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The law now authorizes the purchase of bonds as well as the payment of such as are subject to call. They are a debt, and when I speak of debt I mean not only the principal but the interest as well, for it is all debt. Now, if we have money in the Treasury we had better apply it to the payment of bonds at a premium even, rather than hold it in the Treasury and pay interest forever.

But we have not come to that yet. That question is not here; it may be some distance off, and the $250,000,000 of 4½ percents. fall due in 1891. Besides, if we should hold our present surplus in the Treasury thirty-three years and continue for that time to pay interest an amount equal to the principal would have been paid for interest and we would still have the principal of the debt to pay in the end. But whatever else we do let us pay and extinguish finally and forever our bonded debt. I will yield, Mr. Chairman, for the committee to rise, asking leave to print with my remarks some tables, and also to include some things I have not had time to read.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to enable the House to carry out its prior order the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration House joint resolution No. 126, had come to no resolution thereon.

PRESIDENTIAL VETOES.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That all Presidential vetoes from the organization of Congress to the present time, arranged in chronological order, be printed as a Senate document.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other" resolutions the Calendar is in order.

Mr. HALE. Before going to the Calendar I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a matter important in the way of transacting public business. I see that in the RECORD of this morning the proceedings of the Senate are reported up to about 9 o'clock last night only, there stopping with the clause in print below, "To be continued." I do not know whose fault it is, or if it is the fault of anybody, either the Printer or Reporter, but I certainly hope that it will not occur again.

I have been looking into the precedents in the past, and I find that invariably almost, when either the Senate or the House sits to a much later hour than the Senate sat last night, the proceedings are reported in full. It is only in cases where one or both of the bodies remain in session clear through the night that the Printer has been unable to give to Congress next morning a full report of the proceedings.

In these last days, with late sessions frequent, it is almost indispensable to Senators and Members that they shall be able when they get the RECORD in the morning to turn to it and see all that has been done up to the time of adjournment the preceding day, unless that be clear around in the morning. I take this occasion to call the attention of the Senate and of anybody else who has to do with the making up of the records and the reports to the matter, with the hope, as I have said, that it will not occur again.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to say a word in reference to the matter of which the Senator from Maine spoke, and that is that the RECORD appears this morning in an unfinished condition. I know it is true that on other occasions proceedings of greater length and making more pages in the RECORD have been printed and laid on our tables at the commencement of the session of the next day; but I wish to call attention to the fact that there are fifty pages of the RECORD to-day. All of it was taken down yesterday as it was spoken, written out in long hand, and printed and laid upon our tables, so that we have to-day the proceedings of yesterday. That matter would make a book in the form in which books are ordinarily printed of at least two hundred pages.

I think that sometimes we are a little disposed to criticise our reporters here if they do not keep up with the proceedings. We had thirteen hours of continuous session yesterday, and it is almost too much to ask of the reporters that they shall be able to furnish all the manuscript in time to have it printed by morning. I do not know whether they did it yesterday or not, or whether the failure to have it all supplied to us was with the reporters or the printers; but there is a limit to human endurance. Senators sometimes think that limit is pretty nearly reached when we sit here in these long sessions, but certainly the labors of the reporters are very much greater than the labors of Senators.

However, I rose for the purpose of saying that I am opposed to sessions which last long into the night. If we can not get the business which we must transact from the other House early enough so that we can transact it and adjourn at that period when it is usually supposed Congress will adjourn, then I think we had better stay here until we complete it and sit during the ordinary business hours of the day. I do not think we ought to ruin health by sitting here in long night sessions for the mere purpose of hurrying up so that we may adjourn. In other words, to put it very bluntly, I do not want the Senate to furnish the corpse for the next funeral.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire to say that I fully concur in the remarks made by the Senator from Connecticut. I do not think that night sessions are productive of good. I believe that when we meet at 11 o'clock and stay continuously in session until 6 we ought to adjourn, and that by continuing with night sessions we shall not hasten the day of final adjournment.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is now closed and the Calendar will be proceeded with under the special order. The Chair wishes to state that pending the execution of this order he will enforce the rule of the Senate, and he appeals to Senators to aid him in doing so. The rule expressly prohibits any other business from interfering with the execution of this order. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

ELIZA ELLEN EHLE.

The bill (S. 1775) for the relief of Eliza Ellen Ehle was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been already read at length. The pending amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 it is proposed to strike out the word "on," after "interest," and to insert "to;" and after the word "date" to insert the word "only;" so as to read:

With the accrued interest to the date only when they were called for redemption.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 24, after the word "destroyed," it is proposed to insert the words——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments are so illegibly written that they are with difficulty read. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside informally so that the manuscript may be deciphered.

Mr. MILLER. Whose manuscript is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That of the Senator who proposed the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Perhaps the Senator who proposed the amendment can read his own writing. I did not propose it. Did the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] propose it?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir. Anybody can read my writing, even a three years old child, it is so plain.

Mr. MILLER. I did not suppose that any amendment was necessary to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am advised that just as the bill was about to be passed over yesterday, when the morning hour was expiring, I proposed an amendment, and I believe the clerks got only part of the amendment. My amendment was, in line 6, after the word "the" and before the word "date," to insert words so as to read "with the accrued interest on the same up to the date of the call for redemption or payment;" and then to strike out the other words down to "stopped." I think that will make it correct. Let the Secretary read and see if that will not make it correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated. Is the Senator from New York desirous that the Senate shall wait on this matter? The pending amendment can not be read.

Mr. MILLER. I have not offered any amendment. The bill has been reported unanimously from the Finance Committee. If the Senator from Missouri has any amendment to offer I shall not object to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from New York can not wait a moment I shall have to object to the consideration of the bill. He can do as he chooses.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator from New York has not objected to waiting; it is the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the bill be passed over informally and be taken up after some other matters on the Calendar are disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside for the present.

Mr. MILLER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: Senate bill 1775, which was passed over informally, will now be proceeded with. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, at the beginning of the line, it is proposed to strike out the word "value" and insert "amount;" and after the word "interest," in the same line, to strike out the word "on" and insert the words "thereon up to;" and after the word "date," in the same line, to strike out the words "when they were called for redemption and when interest was stopped" and to insert "of their call for redemption or payment;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine into the claim of Eliza Ellen Ehle, of Canajoharie, State of New York, to be paid the amount, with the accrued interest thereon up to the date of their call for redemption or payment, of the following-described coupon bonds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, after the word "destroyed," it is proposed to insert the words "and were when destroyed owned by said Ehle;" in line 26 to strike out the word "value" and insert "amount;" after the word "the," where it occurs the second time in the line, to insert the words "face of;" and after the word "interest," in the amendment proposed by the committee in line 26, to insert "to the date of calling the same;" so as to read:

And if the Secretary of the Treasury, after such examination, is satisfied that said bonds are destroyed, and were when destroyed owned by said Ehle, and is also satisfied that they have not since been presented to and paid by the Government of the United States, he shall cause the amount of the face of the same, together with interest to the date of calling the same as aforesaid, to be paid to the said Eliza Ellen Ehle, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY, ETC.

The next bills on the Calendar were the bill (S. 2620) to repeal so much of the act of June 20, 1878, as provides for the appointment of second lieutenants in the Signal Corps, and the bill (S. 2621) to limit the printing and engraving for the Geological Survey, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, and the Signal Service.

Mr. INGALLS. Let those two bills be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills are objected to and will be passed over.

PROTECTION OF PROPERTY FROM FIRE.

The bill (S. 1212) for the further protection of property from fire and safety of lives in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire whether there is any time fixed in the bill within which these improvements must be made in order to relieve the owners from this liability. It seems to me there ought to be some time within which it shall be done. The point of my suggestion is this——

Mr. INGALLS. It requires notice to be served by the authorities, and gives parties thirty days in which to comply with the act.

Mr. PLATT. That is rather short, but as I heard the bill read I thought there was no time given at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty days are required. The amendments reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 8, after the word "academy," the committee report to insert the word "school;" so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners, in fee or for life, of every building constructed and used, or intended to be used, as a hotel, factory, manufactory, theater, tenement house, seminary, college, academy, hospital, asylum, hall, or place of amusement, and of the trustee or trustees of every estate, association, society, college, academy, school, hospital, or asylum owning or using any building 50 feet high or upward, to provide and cause to be erected and affixed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 13, to strike out the words "building inspector and chief engineer of the fire department" and insert "commissioners of the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

And cause to be erected and affixed to said building iron fire-escapes and combined stand-pipes and ladders, or either of said appliances as may be approved and adopted by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, after the word "lighted," to insert "when occupied;" so as to read:

That in all hotels, factories, manufactories, workshops, schools, seminaries, colleges, hospitals, asylums, halls, or places of amusement, or other places mentioned in this act, the hallways and stairways shall be properly lighted when occupied at night.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask permission at this time to report from the Committee on Commerce an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks the unanimous consent of the Senate in suspension of the present order to receive a report. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with the recommendation that it be inserted in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Without objecting to this, I desire to be understood as objecting to any business as far as I can that interferes with the consideration of the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say——

Mr. BLAIR. I am not objecting to this.

Mr. CONGER. A matter going to the Committee on Appropriations for the deficiency bill or any other appropriation bill ought necessarily to have precedence of other business.

Mr. BLAIR. But it is taking up this hour for the Calendar, and at half past 12 there will be an opportunity to present such business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that it is in violation of the unanimous understanding that anything should be interposed in exclusion of the Calendar during this call. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE TO NAVY-YARD EMPLOYÉS.

The bill (S. 2268) to grant leaves of absence to employés in United States navy-yards was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

LOTTERY CIRCULARS.

The bill (S. 2066) to amend section 3894 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the transmission through the mails of lottery, gift-enterprise, and other circulars was next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over. We can not consider it under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and goes over under the rule.

NAVAL CADET-ENGINEERS.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. 60) for the purpose of temporarily increasing the number of assistant engineers in the United States Navy by restoring certain cadet-engineers named therein to their legal rights and to their proper office and rank in the United States Navy, authorizing and directing the President to appoint such cadet-engineers (graduates) assistant engineers, to commission them as such, and to antedate their commissions.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the joint resolution goes over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill stands on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. PLATT. With regard to that case I do not ask to have it taken up at this time. The motion to reconsider was entered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I have had some conference with him, and I hope that his objection may be so satisfied that he will withdraw it at some future time, but I do not ask to have the bill considered now.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICTS.

The bill (H. R. 6979) authorizing the construction of additional light-house districts was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 4670 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

The Light-House Board shall arrange the ocean, gulf, lake, and river coasts of the United States into light-house districts, not exceeding sixteen in number.

It also proposes to repeal any law or regulation prohibiting the employment in the light-houses of the United States of persons of more than forty-five years of age.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask for order in the Senate? I have been endeavoring to hear the bills read, but I am utterly unable to hear the bills or to know what business is being transacted in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please come to order. Conversation will be suspended. Bills are being rapidly passed, and it is the right of Senators to hear what is being done.

RANGE-LIGHTS AND BEACONS.

The bill (H. R. 7471) to provide for the establishment of additional aids to navigation to guide vessels through the channels leading to Pensacola, Fla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to establish range-lights near Fort McRae; to re-establish the Fort Barrancas ranges; to establish lighted beacons at or near Devil's Point, Escambia Bay; at or near the Anchorage, in Santa Maria de Galvaez Bay; at or near the turn of the channel; and at Bay Point, Blackwater Bay; and that a day-beacon be placed to mark the shoals between the Anchorage and Blackwater Bay, Florida; the entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $17,250.

Mr. PLATT. In line 11, after the word "of," I move to insert the word "all;" so as to read: "the entire cost of all." As it reads now it refers only to the last light-house, I think.

Mr. MILLER. Does the Senator from Connecticut think that necessary to guard this bill? This is a House bill, and if amended it may not be possible for it to become a law at this session.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the point made by the Senator from New York?

Mr. MILLER. I ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks the amendment necessary? The Committee on Commerce believe this to be an important matter, and being a House bill, as we are very near the end of the session, the hope was that it might be passed without amendment at all, unless it shall be absolutely necessary to amend it.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I think it is open to the construction that it refers only to the last point named in the bill; but as this is a House bill and as possibly there may be no practical danger that it will receive that construction, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHTS AT THE MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

The bill (H. R. 7633) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments; in line 5, after the word "follows," to strike out the words "a light-ship off the entrance to the jetties to the South Pass; higher" and to insert "Higher;" and, in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-two" and insert "twenty-seven;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be established additional aids to navigation off and near the passes at the mouth of the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana, as follows: Higher and more powerful lights at or near the outer ends of the jetties at the South Pass, to replace those now in existence; a steam or hot-air fog-signal at or near the end of the east jetty; a higher and more powerful light on one of the jetties at the head of the passes; and a fog-signal at or near Cubit's Gap, in said Mississippi River; the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $27,500.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. As the bill has to go back to the House amended I move, in line 12, that the word "entire" be inserted before the word "cost;" so as to read:

The entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $27,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICTS.

Mr. CONGER. The bill (H. R. 6979) authorizing the construction of additional light-house districts was passed while my attention was occupied. I wish to offer an amendment to that bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be regarded as reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed will be regarded as reconsidered, and the bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out all after line 7 in the bill.

Mr. BECK. If the bill is to be sent back to the House amended I suggest that the word "establishment" be substituted for "construction" in the title of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I shall have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the part proposed to be stricken out be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after line 7 of the bill in the following words:

That any law or regulation prohibiting the employment in the light-houses of the United States of persons of more than forty-five years of age be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONGER. The present law limits the age to fifty years instead of forty-five years. It was a mistake in the age, but the Light-House Board said that fifty years was perhaps a proper age, and that this did not repeal any law but left it in confusion, and desired that this clause might be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. CALL. I should like to understand the Senator from Michigan. Will he repeat his statement?

Mr. CONGER. The proposition as it came from the House is that no person over forty-five years of age shall be employed as light-house keeper, repealing a law which it is assumed made that limit of age. The law limits the age to fifty years instead of forty-five years. Therefore this provision would not repeal any such law, for there is none fixing forty-five years, but there is a law fixing fifty, and the Light-House Board recommend that this be stricken out and that it remain at fifty. It was evidently a misconception on the part of some gentleman in the other House.

Mr. HALE. I should like to hear what the Senator from Michigan is saying, because it is upon a subject on which I desire information. It is very important in this service along the coast that thoroughly well, strong men, in the prime of life, be employed in it. That, of course, is the foundation of any previous restriction as to age. I came into the Chamber just now as a portion of the bill was being read, and I do not know how its terms as amended left the question of age, and I want the Senator to tell me.

Mr. CONGER. I will state to the Senator that this proposition assumes that the law requires that they shall not be appointed at an age exceeding forty-five years. The law limits the time of their appointment as to age at fifty years.

Mr. HALE. Where is that law?

Mr. CONGER. There is a section named in the bill. Somebody by some misconception has proposed to repeal the law, assuming it to be forty-five years, when there is, as I understand, no such law. The secretary of the Light-House Board came to me with a request that it might be left at fifty years, as it is in the law.

Mr. HALE. If it is the law that fifty years is the limit and there is no law that fixes forty-five years as the limit, why put in any provision? If the law to-day is fifty years, as it ought to be, and there is no forty-five years' law, as there ought not to be, why meddle or deal with the law?

Mr. CONGER. That is why I have moved to strike out the provision.

Mr. HALE. That I did not understand.

Mr. CONGER. I have moved to strike out that provision in the bill.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. CALL. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over.

Mr. CALL. I do not refer to the bill, but to the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask that the portion of the bill as it stands be read and then the portion of it be read as it will be if amended, so that we may have an understanding of it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4670 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"The Light-House Board shall arrange the ocean, gulf, lake, and river coasts of the United States into light-house districts, not exceeding sixteen in number."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan proposes to strike out the rest of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. What is the part proposed to be stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the part proposed to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after line 7 in the following words:

That any law or regulation prohibiting the employment in the light-houses of the United States of persons of more than forty-five years of age be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to strike out the latter part of the bill.

Mr. CALL. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. There are a great many people in this country who are over fifty years of age who are as strong and active and vigorous and capable of service as any man under that age.

Mr. BUTLER. This is to strike out the prohibition.

Mr. CALL. There is a regulation of the Light-House Board which regulates the appointment of these people and limits it to persons under forty-five years of age.

Mr. CONGER. Under fifty years. The regulation limits it to fifty years and the amendment limits it to forty-five. We leave it as the Light-House Board thought best to have it, but their regulation is fifty years.

Mr. CALL. Then I am for the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The limitation is rather a matter of regulation than a matter of statute law.

Mr. CALL. I see I was correct. The bill passed by the House is:

That any law or regulation prohibiting the employment in the light-houses of the United States of persons of more than forty-five years of age be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That repeal would leave them at liberty to appoint persons over forty-five years of age. As far as this bill is concerned if the regulation be forty-five or fifty years it is repealed and it leaves them at liberty to appoint without regard to age. I know personally several persons in the light-house service, and who have been so for years on the coast of Florida, who are over fifty years of age, who are more vigorous and more experienced and more capable than many men to be found under that age. The subject was brought to my attention in the case of a man who has served as a volunteer light-keeper on a dangerous portion of the Saint John's River for twenty years in a malarious and unhealthful location. He was recommended by every steamboat captain and every vessel-owner of every description on the Saint John's River for appointment to the position of light-keeper at the Volusia bar, and he was refused the appointment, although he has been voluntarily doing that service in the pay of the steamboats, because he was over forty-five years of age. I venture to say that he is one of the most vigorous, active, strong, and capable men that can be found in this country.

I think you had better leave it to the discretion of the appointing officer, who can, if a man is incapacitated, whether he is forty-five or fifty or sixty years of age, refuse him an appointment, and if not, give it to him.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt from hearing the language read here that it would repeal any regulation that fixes forty-five years of age as the limit, or any higher number than that, and would leave it all open to the discretion of the board in the appointment. I think that would be pernicious. I think the Senator from Michigan is right in striking out any clause here that repeals that, for while it may be true in exceptional cases that vigorous men, endowed with every faculty unimpaired, may be found in the light-house service above fifty years of age, still the limitation was based upon thorough experience and wisdom that not more than fifty years of age should be allowed to men in this service generally.

Mr. CONGER. At the time of their appointment.

Mr. HALE. At the time of their appointment I mean, of course. You may find men competent at that age, and who will continue to be so for ten years, and some of them for twenty; but the general rule is clearly a good one, that into this service, beset with peril and with hardship, involving endurance such as hardly any other field in life does, should be open only to active men in the possession of health. In some cases of light-houses that have but one keeper, upon him depend the lives and property of people upon the sea. There ought not to be any variation of this good rule of limitation because there are exceptions such as the Senator from Florida arrays here. The service ought not to be imperiled by allowing appointments above fifty years of age, because if it is allowed they will be made because the board will be beset and it will be impossible to resist importunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not concur with the views of the Senator from Maine. I have known some light-house keepers beyond the age of fifty years, men who served faithfully in the discharge of the duties of those positions. For one I believe that they are fully as competent, fully as watchful, fully as careful in the discharge of their duties as men not so old.

I do not see the use of adopting rules and regulations that exclude from these positions men who are competent simply because they have arrived at a certain period of life. For one I am opposed to undertaking to fixing such a limit in every instance, thus depriving the Light-House Board of the privilege of appointing a proper man simply because he has arrived at the age of forty-five or fifty years. We do not make any such limitation on Senators or judges of courts, and I do not see the propriety of an iron rule which shall exclude every man simply because he has arrived at a certain period of time when he may be in possession of all the physical and mental faculties necessary to fill the place.

Mr. CONGER. I did not suppose this would give rise to discussion. It is so important that this new light-house system should be established for the convenience of the board and for the convenience of commerce that with the permission of the Senate I will withdraw my request for a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws his motion to reconsider and the bill stands passed.

JOHN LITTLE AND HOBART WILLIAMS.

The bill (S. 2704) for the relief of John Little and Hobart Williams was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Kansas went out a moment since; he told me he desired to object to that case. I know nothing about the case myself.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the light-house bill passed?

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that this bill be informally passed over until the Senator from Kansas returns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 2704) for the relief of John Little and Hobart Williams.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the bill I promised the Senator from Kansas I would object to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope it may be informally passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be informally passed over.

ADDITIONAL LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICTS.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire what became of the light-house bill which was under discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was passed. It was pending on a motion to reconsider, and the motion to reconsider has been withdrawn and the bill remains passed as it came from the House.

Mr. HALE. I understood that it went over.

Mr. CONGER. No. I withdrew the motion to reconsider.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 57) for the erection of a public building at Oshkosh, Wis., with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2475) to amend an act approved May 25, 1882, entitled "An act for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Tex.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ESTATE OF C. M. BRIGGS.

The bill (H. R. 3828) for the relief of the estate of C. M. Briggs, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Court of Claims is hereby given, subject to the proviso hereinafter mentioned, like jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the legal representatives of C. M. Briggs, deceased, for the proceeds of 455 bales of cotton, now in the Treasury of the United States, alleged to have been owned, in whole or in part, by said Briggs, as is given to said court by the acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, upon petition to be filed in said court at any time within two years from the passage of this act, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that said Briggs was in fact loyal to the United States Government, and that the assignment to him hereinafter mentioned was bona fide, the court shall not have jurisdiction of the case, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed: And provided further, That if the court shall find that the alleged assignment from one Morehead to said Briggs, of date April 18, 1862, under which said Briggs claimed said cotton, was intended only as security to said Briggs for indebtedness, and against contingent liabilities assumed by him for said Morehead, judgment shall be rendered only for such portion of the proceeds of said cotton as shall equal the moneys actually due to said Briggs at the date of said assignment, and such as were afterward actually paid by said Briggs to or for said Morehead

Mr. SPOONER. I offer an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS.

The bill (S. 2516) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

Mr. PLUMB. May I inquire if that bill is objected to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] objected.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois not to object to that bill. The company is ready to build the bridge, and it is a very important work, not only for that locality, but for all the section of country west of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill will be stated.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it competent to move to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not, under the rule.

MARY E. CASEY.

The bill (H. R. 5003) for the relief of Mary E. Casey was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there shall be paid to Mary E. Casey, of Richardson County, Nebraska, $133.34, that being the amount she paid to the receiver of public money at the land office at Beatrice, Nebr., on an entry made June 21, 1878, on the south half of the northeast quarter of section 29, township 1, range 17 east, Nebraska, being a portion of the lands of the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, which said entry was afterward contested and decided against said Mary E. Casey, and duly canceled January 7, 1880; to be paid in the same manner provided for the repayment of moneys paid for the purchase of public lands, section 2362 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS AND PURCHASERS OF LANDS IN NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

The bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported by the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the bill as it came from the House read and then the amendment.

The bill was read, and also the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That for the purpose of reimbursing persons, and the grantees, heirs, and devisees of persons, who, under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, settled upon or purchased lands within the grant made by an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph," approved July 23, 1866, and to whom patents have been issued therefor, but against which persons, or their grantees, heirs, or devisees, decrees have been rendered by the United States circuit court on account of the priority of said grant made in the act above entitled, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as shall be required for said purpose, is hereby appropriated: Provided, however, That no part of said sum shall be paid to any one of said parties until he shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of the said decree, duly certified, and also a certificate of the judge of said court rendering the same to the effect that such decree was rendered in a bona fide controversy between a plaintiff showing title under the grant made in said act and a defendant holding the patent or holding by deed under the patentee, and that the decision was in favor of the plaintiff on the ground of the priority of the grant made by said act to the filing, settlement, or purchase by the defendant or his grantor; and said claimant shall also file with the said decree and certificate a bill of the costs in such case, duly certified by the clerk and judge of said court. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the amount due to each defendant on the basis of $3.50 per acre for the tract his title to which shall have failed as aforesaid, and the costs appearing by the bill thereof. He shall then make a requisition upon the Treasury for the sum found to be due to such claimant, or his heirs and devisees or assigns, and shall pay the same to him, taking such release, acquittance, or discharge as shall forever bar any further claim against the United States on account of the failure of the title as aforesaid.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator who reported this bill to explain the difference between the House bill, which is stricken out, and the amendment which is proposed. I desire to call his attention to one or two matters. In the bill as it came from the House I see that the Secretary of the Interior is directed to adjust the amount due to each defendant, on the basis of what he shall have paid, not exceeding $3.50 per acre;" while I find that in the amendment the Secretary of the Interior is "to adjust the amount due to each defendant on the basis of $3.50 per acre," having no reference or allusion to what he has paid. Then I see that in the text of the bill as it came from the House there was this section:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall only apply to the actual and bona fide settlers on the lands therein referred to, and no one person shall be entitled to the benefits of this act for compensation for more than 160 acres of land: Provided, That all other persons who purchased any part of said land at $1.25 per acre, and the money was actually paid into the Treasury, shall be entitled to repayment of the money so actually paid by them.

I should like to understand why that is not a good provision and why we should pay back $3.50 an acre without reference to how much had been paid for it. Those are the points to which I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12.30 having arrived, this order is closed, it being the last day of the order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The river and harbor bill will be placed before the Senate as the unfinished business.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I submit the following motion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the request of the Senator from Kansas for a separate vote on each amendment the Senator from Minnesota offers a motion, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the bill be committed to the Committee on Commerce with instructions to amend the same as voted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, except that in respect of the sum of money in each and every item and head of appropriation and the sum of the aggregate thereof contained in the bill and in the amendments agreed upon by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole shall be reduced 30 per cent. of the amounts thereof respectively; and that said committee amend said bill accordingly, and not otherwise; and report the same complete forthwith.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who offered that motion, that there ought to be a vote in the Senate upon the amendments of the Committee of the Whole first. Then let that motion which he now offers be presented after the Senate has voted on the amendments which were acted upon in the Committee of the Whole.

Now, for illustration, the item in the House bill appropriating $350,000 for the completion of the work at the Muscle Shoals was reduced by a Senate amendment $100,000. I desire a yea-and-nay vote in the Senate upon that amendment of the committee, so that if this bill is recommitted it will go before the committee on the same basis with other appropriations. If there is not a yea-and-nay vote on that great work and this motion prevails, it will reduce the appropriation made by the Senate committee, $250,000, 30 per cent., when the House has appropriated $350,000 on the report of the engineers that that amount is indispensably necessary to complete the work, and there are $2,100,000 lying there perfectly useless to commerce until that great work is completed so that boats can pass through those shoals. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the engineer telegraphed me since the bill has been before the Senate, is indispensable to enable him to complete that great work within the next year; and if the amendment reducing that amount appropriated by the House, $100,000, passes, it will delay that work for two years and keep that vast amount of investment there dead to the world. I insist that the vote upon the amendments which have been and will be reserved in the Senate be taken in the Senate, and then let the motion of the Senator be presented.

Mr. SEWELL. In view of the proposition of the chairman of the committee, I should like to get information as to what the amount of this bill is at the present time.

Mr. MCMILLAN. As it now stands the bill appropriates $18,513,775.

Mr. SEWELL. What was it as it came to the Senate from the House?

Mr. MCMILLAN. As it came from the House, $15,182,200.

Mr. SEWELL. A reduction of 30 per cent. will reduce it to between twelve and thirteen million.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Thirteen or fourteen million.

Mr. SEWELL. Is this motion authorized by the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the motion to refer is offered by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. VEST. Not by the consent of all the committee. I dissent.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri did not agree to the proposition.

Mr. SEWELL. The motion is to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to refer with instructions is now pending.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to amend by making the reduction 25 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. CALL. I concur entirely with the Senator from Alabama that this motion should not be adopted without a vote of the Senate upon the amendments which are proposed to be reserved.

In the case of Fernandina, Fla., the House bill gave $150,000, being a very small proportion of the amount recommended by the engineers, which was $600,000 for this year. The Senate reduced that $70,000, and insisted upon the report of the committee reducing that amount $70,000. Now, if we adopt the sliding scale of 30 per cent. and apply it to all the large and unreasonable accumulations of the amounts appropriated by the action of the Senate—unreasonable not in respect to the merits of each appropriation but in respect to the others which have been recommended—the Senate have reduced 30 per cent. still more, while others have been largely increased by the action of the Senate. I would desire to have a vote in the Senate upon the action of the Committee of the Whole supporting the action of the Committee on Commerce cutting down the appropriation for Fernandina.

Mr. SEWELL. I withdraw the amendment I offered to make the amount 25 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee—and before the motion is put I shall move to amend it—to the estimates and the report of the committee in reference to the improvement of the Illinois River. The expectation is that two locks and dams will be put in for the benefit of the navigation of that river below Hennepin during this present fiscal year, with a view of deepening the channel of that river, and the estimate is $350,000. The appropriation reported in the bill is $100,000. That $100,000 reduced to $70,000 would be altogether inadequate. I do not suppose anything I say will have any influence on the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator does not appreciate, I think, the weight he has.

Mr. LOGAN. I say I do not suppose what I say will have any influence with the committee, because the committee make this report for the reduction in the bill; but I desire that I be permitted to make my statement anyhow. You then will reduce the whole appropriation for the Illinois River to $70,000. The chairman, with his knowledge of the work required to be done there, knows that $70,000 amounts to nothing; you might as well not appropriate anything. I think that will be the effect in reference to a great many very important improvements. If they had cut out a great many improvements that have been put in here that are new the bill could have been reduced, and at the same time had the improvements that are necessary properly appropriated for and advanced during the present fiscal year.

The Illinois River improvement runs as far back as 1832. The State of Illinois has expended large amounts of money herself when the Government would not appropriate for it for the purpose of opening up and making that stream navigable and effective for commerce.

I only cite this one instance. I could name several other appropriations that will be affected in like manner. Now, I would ask to be permitted before this motion is put to make the same motion I did last night to increase the Illinois River appropriation to $150,000, and I think the chairman of the committee ought to accept it.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire for information, if the Senator will yield to me a moment, what is the exact proposition before the Senate? Is it to recommit with instructions to reduce the increases made by the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; the motion is to recommit the whole bill with instructions to reduce the appropriations 30 per cent. In other words, it is a horizontal cut at the whole bill. I suppose that this education in reference to a horizontal slice at this bill has been brought about by the evidences we have had of great knowledge and experience in reference to the tariff, making a horizontal slice at that. I suppose the Senator from Minnesota has been educated up to this point by an Illinois man; but the Illinois men in this Senate do not educate as well as those who are in the other branch of Congress. I am opposed to this manner of cutting down this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to its being out. I was about out myself.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to take the sense of the Senate as to the operation of the five-minute rule without discussion. The Chair desires to call attention in regard to the obscurity of the order made yesterday in regard to the five-minute rule. The Chair desires to carry out the wishes of the Senate. The Chair will read the order as he understands it, as reported in the RECORD, made on the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], who asked unanimous consent that the five-minute rule should be applied to debate:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that in the further consideration of this bill debate be limited under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection. The Chair would understand, therefore, that the five-minute rule was applied to this bill in all its stages, that no Senator should make more than one speech on any proposition, and then only for five minutes. If that is the understanding of the Senate, the Chair will endeavor to carry it out.

Mr. INGALLS. That was not my understanding when the arrangement was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can only say——

Mr. BUTLER. What is the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The five-minute rule is generally called the eighth rule.

Mr. BUTLER. I called attention last night to that understanding of the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is some obscurity in the language of the presiding officer [Mr. FRYE], who was in the chair at that time, about it. There was no objection, it seems, to applying the five-minute rule to all parts of the bill and to every stage of it. If so, it is the duty of the Chair to limit debate to five minutes by each Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. That is not an order that the Chair can enforce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; but the Chair can call attention to the fact.

Mr. INGALLS. I stated distinctly that I did not so understand and did not so consent. There was no such understanding or agreement so far as my action was concerned.

Mr. MCMILLAN. So far as I am concerned, when I made that request it was with the understanding and expectation that the Senate would pass the bill yesterday under the agreement of the Senate, and I supposed that agreement to apply the five-minute rule included all the amendments and all the motions affecting the bill until its passage. It did not include the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has the floor.

Mr. VEST. Are we proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands, by unanimous consent. As a matter of course the Chair can not enforce the rule, but he can call attention to it.

Mr. VEST. I suppose this motion will prevail.

Mr. INGALLS. We ought to have an understanding about this matter before we proceed further. The Senator from Missouri will allow me to interpose. There never has been any application of the five-minute rule except as to the question of amendments on any appropriation bill; and here comes a motion to commit, that under the rules has priority over a motion to amend; and to say that any understanding could limit debate to five minutes on a motion to commit this bill, which involves the whole question of policy and propriety, is contrary to justice. I hope the Chair will not feel called upon to state when any Senator is on the floor that the five-minute rule is in operation upon that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will submit a motion the Chair will present it to the Senate so that it may be determined.

Mr. HALE. I only rise to say in giving my testimony on this matter that when the proposition was made yesterday by the Senator from Minnesota in charge of the bill [Mr. MCMILLAN] I was occupying the floor. My attention naturally was called to the terms of the proposition and to its final adoption. I stated then that while I could not go on and finish in five minutes what I should like to say about certain clauses and sections in the bill, yet for the sake of hastening the public business I would not object; and thereupon the Chair put the proposition, and it was heard by every Senator distinctly I presume. I was watching it keenly, because it interfered with me first and cut me off. But unanimous consent was given, and I had no doubt at that time in yielding myself that it applied to the bill and all amendments, and that the rule was to be agreed upon and settled and fixed. I did not think at that time any Senator would seek to disturb it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. What is the Senator from Maine speaking on? What is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The river and harbor bill is before the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I know, but there is an objection made to the ruling of the Chair. The statement made by the Senator from Maine is not correct, for I did object and was the only one who did. I mean to have that appear now and hereafter.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Virginia at that time made no objection. I only state this as my understanding; and I think it was clearly stated at the time. All the Senators who were here perhaps did not participate, but it was clearly understood, and is in the RECORD.

Mr. VEST. I desire to call attention of the President of the Senate to what appears in to-day's RECORD on this subject:

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent that on all amendments hereafter debate be limited to five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that in the further consideration of this bill debate be limited under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

The request was only as to the amendments to the bill. That was my understanding, and I think it was the understanding of the entire Senate. It is true the presiding officer is made by the RECORD to say that it applied to further debate on the bill, which of course includes the main bill and the motion to recommit——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator be kind enough to read what follows?

Mr. HOAR. May I make a suggestion? I do not think that any Senator would insist on the enforcement as of unanimous consent of a limitation of debate which was not understood at the time and which was ambiguous, as is very clear from what the Senator reads. I hope we shall have unanimous consent that the limitation shall apply only to the amendments.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I object, with all due deference to the Senator from Missouri. I will not give unanimous consent, and for a reason which was apparent here yesterday. I am standing out in opposition to this bill, and all the friends of it want all the speeches they can get in in favor of it to be unlimited in time and to curtail all the debate that can possibly suggest reasons why it ought not to be passed. I am objecting, and you can not get unanimous consent unless I consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. Before the bill is recommitted, which I suppose will be the result, I desire to notice an assertion that was made yesterday when we were discussing the appropriation for the Mississippi River. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] said:

The engineer, in his diagram showing the sinuosities of this river, measures the channel at one point 30 feet right through the center of the spot in this winding way, but when you take the length of a vessel and seek to get it through that channel the engineer says that one drawing 25 or 26 feet of water will be grounded; and he says in his report that there is a difference between the legal and the navigable channel. The Senator from Vermont has given the correct explanation.

And that "explanation" was this rather sinister remark:

Mr. EDMUNDS. What the engineer means, as I understand him, by legal channel as distinguished from a navigable one is a channel that will draw money from the Treasury but will not carry a ship. [Laughter.]

A demand was made for the reading of the report. The Senator from Nebraska stated that he would read the report before he concluded the discussion.

If this debate means anything, it means most unquestionably that Captain Eads is drawing money from the Treasury of the United States to which he is not entitled and that he is doing this either through the reckless negligence or the willful fraud and complicity of the engineer officer whose duty it is to make monthly reports in regard to the depth of water on the jetties. I have taken the trouble to procure this morning the original reports upon file in the War Office, and I desire now, in common justice to a gentleman who is my friend and constituent, to read what those reports are. Here is the annual report of Mr. Heuer, who has charge of this work, and without going into all these tables I simply read a recapitulation of the whole report:

From the preceding results it will be seen that the least depth at any point throughout the channel from the main river to the Gulf of Mexico is 29.8 feet, and the least width of the 26-foot channel is 240 feet.

Since August 1, 1882, with the exception of seventeen days previously mentioned, there has been "a channel through the jetties 26 feet in depth, not less than 200 feet in width at the bottom, and having through it a central depth of 30 feet without regard to width;" also, through the shoal at the head of South Pass, and "through the pass itself," there has been "a channel having a navigable depth of 26 feet."

In making this report the engineer follows the exact language of the statute itself, which requires that Eads shall maintain a channel at least 26 feet deep, 200 feet in width at the bottom, and 30 feet deep in the middle of the channel. This is the exact language——

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I see the Senator from Nebraska is not in his seat, I will read what I suppose he referred to. But here he is.

Mr. VEST. I should like to hear it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not mean to interfere in the discussion. I thought the Senator from Nebraska was out, and I thought I should call attention to what I suppose he referred to, on page 1378 of Executive Document No. 1, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, part 2, where the report of the engineer reads in this way:

Attention is invited to that portion of the chart No. 1 showing the channel in the Gulf about 500 feet beyond the outer ends of the jetties. There we find the legal—

"Legal" is italicized in this print—

There we find the legal channel 26 feet deep, having a width of 230 feet and a central depth of 30 feet or more; but this channel makes such a sharp bend or turn of about 90° that I believe it would be impracticable for a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet to make the turn without grounding on the shoals on either side. Attention is invited to this point to illustrate that a legal channel may not be a navigable one.

Mr. VEST. That is outside of the jetties—I call attention to that—not inside, and is not covered by the limitation required by the statute. That is 500 feet outside of the jetties. The Senator from Nebraska stated that the engineer also said in his report that a vessel drawing 25 feet of water had grounded in the jetties. Here is his report in regard to that:

But three vessels were aground during the year, one near the foot of Goat Island and two on the rut beyond the end of the jetties; one of these ships drawing 24.5 feet. In each case it was stated that the vessel was handled badly. The depth of the water in the channel was measured when the vessel grounded, and the fact shown that it was not for want of depth of water that these accidents occured.

I have obtained the monthly reports, in order that there shall be no question about this matter. In the report up to June 26, 1886, it is said:

About 5 in the afternoon of May 7 the steamship Australian, outward bound, drawing 24 feet, grounded beyond the ends of the jetties by going too far to the westward. She was entirely out of the channel, but after remaining nearly thirty-five hours floated off without damage.

If that is the reference made by the Senator from Nebraska, the engineer states explicitly that it was by bad management and by going too far to the westward and not from the want of water that this accident occurred.

I shall not detain the Senate by reading at length these reports. Here are the certificates from the Engineer Bureau for the present month, in which it is stated that Captain Eads has complied fully with his contract with the Government and the money has been paid over to him, and he has received $25,000 in three months. The soundings are made by an engineer every month, and I assert now—and I have examined these reports carefully—that in every one of these reports, with the exception of seventeen days when the rise in the Mississippi River caused the deposit of sediment to a certain extent, the channel was fully up to the requirement of the law; and those seventeen days were deducted from his contract price, and he received no pay for them. The least depth of water in the jetties below New Orleans has been 29.8 feet, and Captain Eads's contract with the Government requires only 26 feet with a bottom width of 200 feet, and a 30-foot channel has been preserved in the center. Sir, it is simply naked and bare assertion—and I use no harsh language—it is reckless assertion to state that this money is taken out of the Treasury of the United States in defiance of law and in violation of the contract made by Captain Eads and his associates with the Government.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Only one word, Mr. President, in regard to the subject-matter to which the Senator from Missouri has called attention. There was no intention to call in question the particular contract which Captain Eads had made with the Government, or to say whether Captain Eads had received the full measure of compensation under that contract or whether he had received more. That was not the question raised in the discussion by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] to which I called his attention. He stated, as I understood and as he conceded, that the law called for a navigable channel of 30 feet; and he asserted that vessels drawing 30 feet of water could enter the harbor at New Orleans. That was the only point in question. In speaking of that I called attention to the fact that the engineer who made his report upon that matter had reported that while there was a legal channel of 30 feet that would measure 30 feet by its sinuosities, yet at the same time it was not a navigable channel of 30 feet. What Captain Eads's contract may be with the Government has nothing to do with that question at all, and I had nothing to do with Captain Eads's contract.

If the people of the United States believe, or if the Senator from Louisiana believes (and I suppose he does, because he says so), that we have a navigable channel 30 feet deep under the contract with Captain Eads or under the operations of the Government, then it is clear that they have not what they supposed they were having.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator understand yesterday, when he made a statement about this 26 feet depth of which he speaks, that while it is only 26 feet for a certain width, in the center it is 30 feet, and that the width of which he spoke yesterday was not at a place within the jetties?

Mr. VAN WYCK. It was part of the channel reaching the harbor of New Orleans.

Mr. HOAR. But I certainly understood the Senator, when he made his speech yesterday, and I think the Senator from Vermont conveyed the idea that he meant within the jetties the channel was only 26 feet, because on somebody asking the difference between the legal channel and the navigable channel, the Senator from Vermont said that the legal channel was a channel drawing money from the Government, through which a ship could not pass. Now as I understand this report the engineer says in the first place:

One of the interesting facts connected with the improvement is that the full depths and widths of channels required by law have been maintained throughout the year by Mr. Eads, and that no dredging of any kind has been required on any of this work since February, 1883.

* * * * * * *

Between the jetties during the year there has been some shoaling, varying from 2 to 10 feet in height, but as this shoaling has occurred in the deepest part of the channel no harm has resulted. At present there is a channel through the jetties whose least depth is 31.3 feet.

Thirty feet being, I think, what is required.

There is also a 30-foot channel whose least width is 130 feet, and a 26-foot channel having a least width of 270 feet.

Then he goes on to make the statement which was alluded to by the two Senators yesterday:

Attention is invited to that portion of the chart No. 1 showing the channel in the Gulf about 500 feet beyond the outer ends of the jetties.

I do not understand that Mr. Eads is responsible for that.

There we find the legal channel 26 feet deep, having a width of 230 feet and a central depth of 30 feet or more; but this channel makes such a sharp bend or turn of about 90° that I believe it would be impracticable for a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet to make the turn without grounding on the shoals on either side.

Now in regard to that I should like to say a word; and if I am wrong the Senator from Louisiana will correct me. I remember meeting the senior Senator from Louisiana on the stairs outside of the Senate Chamber last year and he held a telegraphic dispatch in his hand, at any rate he had just received one of which he stated to me the substance, and he stated that a vessel, I think drawing 28 feet and with a heavy load, which he stated had just passed those jetties, which would seem to contradict the statement made here yesterday, if I am right in my memory; the Senator will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. GIBSON. The Senator's memory is perfectly correct.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is this coming out of the time of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HALE. Is there anything in the river and harbor bill about these jetties?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing in the world.

Mr. HALE. How would it do to confine the discussion to the subject before the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. That is a matter entirely in the discretion of Senators. When a public work of this kind for which some of us have a great legislative responsibility is attacked, I want to have the facts known.

Mr. VEST. I did not introduce the matter of the jetties into this debate, but I do not propose to be shut off from stating what I believe to be the truth by any sort of tactics.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I did not introduce the jetties here.

Mr. VEST. Who did, then?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I presume I may have time to reply. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] spoke about the jetties and about the channel and about its being 30 feet.

Mr. GIBSON. I was remarking on the condition of things at the mouth of the Mississippi.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator referred to the jetties as having a channel 30 feet deep. I had taken occasion in connection with the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River to state that the channel was but about 24 feet; hence it became necessary, as this was the only opportunity I could have, to correct myself, and I thought, as the Senator from Louisiana had spoken of it as being 30 feet, I might take advantage of the opportunity to correct the statement I had heretofore made from the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River. That was the only object of my reference to the matter yesterday.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope I may be pardoned for one remark.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I yield if it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to its being uttered unless it is taken out of the Senator's time, because that was done with me yesterday. I object because that was done with me, and everybody should be treated alike. If an objection on my part will secure it, I will object.

Mr. GIBSON. As these jetties are located in the State which I have the honor in part to represent and as the community there is deeply interested in them, I think it due that I should say that the official reports of the engineers, which I hold here, for a long series of time show that the contract made by the Government with Captain Eads has been strictly complied with. The engineers from time to time have testified that the depth of water required by the contract is found in the channel of the jetties. The last report shows, as read by the Senator from Missouri, that the average channel at flood tide was 29.8 feet.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask if he agrees with the statement made by his colleague yesterday in answer to an interrogatory of mine as to the feeling of the commercial interests of New Orleans on the subject?

Mr. GIBSON. Decidedly. I was going to say that the engineer reported 29 feet and some inches. That is at flood tide. When the tide ebbs there is a fall of the channel. I desire to bear testimony on behalf of the commercial community of New Orleans interested in the commerce and trade of the Mississippi Valley to the value of the jetties. We have deep water, all the water that we require for the commercial interests of the great metropolis of the Mississippi Valley. That is the fact.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It was stated yesterday by the Senator that the channel admitted vessels drawing 30 feet of water. So I understood him and I suppose so the people of New Orleans will understand; and it was to correct that impression that I referred to the engineer's report that vessels drawing 26 feet of water cannot enter New Orleans no matter what the contract was. I did not say anything about that and did not impugn anybody.

Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to know whether this was in the channel, or in front of the channel, or where? No matter at what point it was, the fact is that vessels drawing 30 feet of water cannot enter the port of New Orleans, whether the trouble is in the jetties or before the jetties or wherever it may be. The Senator from Vermont has read the statement of the engineer's report that vessels drawing 25 or 26 feet can not pass. He adds:

I believe it would be impracticable for a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet to make the turn without grounding on the shoals on either side.

Then in the same report a little further on I call the attention of Senators to the statement—

VESSELS OUTWARD BOUND.

The total number of vessels which passed to sea during the year was seven hundred and thirty-three——

Mr. GIBSON. What document is the Senator reading from?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Page 1389 of the report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, report of Major Heuer, the same document the Senator has been reading from:

The total number of vessels which passed to sea during the year was 733; of this number 525 were steamers, 46 ships, 123 barks, 11 brigs, and 28 schooners. Thirty-seven of these drew 23 feet or more; eleven drew 24 feet or more, and the greatest draught was 24½ feet.

During the whole year. Here is the engineer's report stating that 24½ feet was the greatest draught of vessels that passed through. I was not far out of the way when I said this was a channel 24 feet, for during the whole year no outward-bound vessel passed drawing more than 24½ feet. The object was to obtain a channel 30 feet. The engineer says no.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him——

Mr. VAN WYCK. Wait a moment.

Attention is invited to that portion of the chart No. 1 showing the channel in the Gulf about 500 feet beyond the outer ends of the jetties. There we find the legal channel 26 feet deep, having a width of 230 feet and a central depth of 30 feet or more; but this channel makes such a sharp bend or turn of about 90 degrees that I believe it would be impracticable for a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet to make the turn without grounding on the shoals on either side.

There he states that vessels drawing 25 or 26 feet of water can not get in; and the fact is that no outward-going vessel drawing more than 24½ feet passed out of New Orleans during the last year.

Mr. LOGAN. Out of seven hundred vessels there are so many drawing 24 feet, so many drawing 23 feet, and so on; but does the engineer report that any vessels went out that did not pass through?

Mr. VAN WYCK. All that go out have to pass through.

Mr. LOGAN. But the point is this: The engineer does not show that any vessel attempted to go out and failed; he only gives the draught of the vessels that did go out. That proves nothing; only that they went through.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The engineer is giving the total number of vessels during the year going out from New Orleans.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. And he gives the number of feet of water they draw, and the highest draught vessel that has gone out has been 24½ feet. In his report he previously states that a vessel drawing 25 or 26 feet would go aground. Is not that plain?

Mr. GIBSON. The Senator said yesterday:

> The fact is that the money has been drawn for a channel which is not such a channel as the law requires.

The reports of the engineers of the work contradict that statement.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The other Senator from Louisiana desired to know whether I made the charge that Captain Eads had drawn more money than he was entitled to. I told him it depended on what the contract was; that if he was to have a channel there for vessels drawing 30 feet, then he has not done it. The question of what the contract is is not for me to determine. I was not discussing that point, I was merely discussing the point suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, and showing that vessels drawing 30 feet could not get in and out of New Orleans. That is all there is about it.

Incidentally I alluded to the fact that the commerce of New Orleans had decreased, and I undertook to show the reason why cotton could be carried from New Orleans to Liverpool by way of New York cheaper than from New Orleans direct, that it was because the heaviest draught vessels could not get in and out of New Orleans. That was the only point I made, and the report of the engineer establishes that fact and everything that I said in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. VEST. Here is the report of the July work from the same engineer. He says:

> The channel beyond the ends of the jetties has a least depth of 31.2 feet; the 26 foot channel is 260 feet wide; and the 30-foot channel 190 feet wide.
> The channel from the main river into South Pass has a least depth of 32.4 feet, and the 30-foot channel is very wide.

That is the last report.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has given me a good deal of information on the subject, but the point is this: Captain Eads did not agree that any vessel drawing any amount of water would go through, but he agreed to make a channel of a certain depth and a certain width, which he has done. If vessels are built of greater draught than that it is not Captain Eads's fault. He made the channel exactly as he agreed to do by his contract under the law, so that vessels must regulate themselves according to the channel, and he can not regulate the channel according to the vessels.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the motion to recommit is put I want again to say to the Senate that I can see here what I call a method, an arrangement about the Eads jetties and to build up the reputation of Mr. Eads, he himself looking forward to that which he calls a ship-railway. I think I hear the sound of laughter. It is easier to laugh than it is to respond.

Who is your engineer that makes this report? If you are going to discuss the Eads ship-railway, discuss it from the time that it was introduced into the Senate, when the endeavor was to get $37,500,000, and when it became known to the country you became ashamed of yourselves and asked only for $7,500,000. That is the engineering, and no Senator can deny it; and to mix it up with this simply to send it down to the country with that much more advantage or possibility of advantage.

When I have seen what you have seen here, Mr. President, what Senators have seen here as to the association of people without regard to party, we may know that by this discussion the association may suggest a ship-railway which may possibly be boosted into consideration. Familiar as we are with the river and harbor bills, no man here would dare to go before his constituents and say that such a bill was conceived in honesty if it embraced the ship-railway scheme to which I refer.

It is a bargain. It is a bargain from the first page to the last page. It has been a bargain in this Senate. It has come here changing the rules of this Senate. It has come here a bill violating from its beginning every representative right in this Senate. Men have argued in favor of it on this floor without order or logic, and when a man has dared to oppose it he has had some member of the Committee on Rules to say that there is a five-minute limitation, and you find some man putting his eye on the clock to see if it was not time he should quit opposing a bill that was to give his people what he knew they ought not to have.

I began this discussion by calling the attention of the Senate to a creek in my own State, and I know that the people whom I in part represent here do not want it improved by the General Government. The bill itself does not even recite the figures at the end of some of the paragraphs that I have called attention to. I want the ship-railway dissociated from this bill; and otherwise we ought not to have the time now devoted to its discussion. I wanted that separated from this bill. I want the explanation that is to come from men who can tell me why in December they ask for $37,000,000, and in May they only ask for $7,000,000 for the same object.

Mr. President, before you look at that clock to call time on me, pardon me if I ask the attention of the Senate to the fact that a remark was read from what had been said by the Senator from Nebraska, seemingly as if there was some doubt as to the correctness of his statement. The Senator in the mean time came in. What the Senator from Vermont said yesterday was read from the RECORD as to the difference between a legal and a navigable channel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the question is put I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, to which I invite the attention of the Senator from Minnesota. If this bill is recommitted to the Committee on Commerce with or without instructions, when it is reported back will it not take its place on the Calendar? Will it not have to be considered in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, acted upon by the Senate, and passed in the ordinary form of a bill reported from a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not undertake to decide that question until the case arises. The bill would be returned to the committee if the motion prevailed.

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair will allow me to suggest that no matter at what stage of the proceedings a bill is recommitted, that ends the consideration of it in the Senate. It goes back to the committee, and when reported back it is reported as every other bill reported from a committee is reported; it takes its place on the Calendar and must go through precisely the same process.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not decide the question now.

Mr. KENNA. I have no doubt, and I think no other Senator has any doubt, that the Senator from Tennessee is correct. For that very reason I trust that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will withhold this motion until the Senate shall have voted on the amendments of the Committee of the Whole, so that after the Senate shall have matured this bill by items as it desires it may be left to simply expend the greatest amount the Senate desires appropriated, then leaving us if we recommit the bill to pass it without further controversy. I believe that course should be pursued.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, if he has any objection to stating why he makes this motion to recommit the bill? We have expended two weeks of the valuable time of the Senate in discussing the provisions of this bill; and now on the eve of final action upon it a proposition comes to recommit it to the Committee on Commerce for the purpose of having it cut down horizontally. It does seem to me, with all respect to the mover of the resolution and to everybody else concerned, that it is absolute child's play. I of course do not mean anything disrespectful to the Senate, but here we have been for two solid weeks discussing this bill, and, without any sort of reason that I have heard, the proposition is now made to recommit it to the committee with instructions to reduce it horizontally 30 per cent. It seems to me the proposition is absolutely absurd.

As the Senator from Illinois said, there are many appropriations now nothing like adequate for the purposes for which they are intended, nothing like up to the estimates, some of them not one-tenth; and now to cut off 30 per cent. of those and leave some that are ample, would be very unequal and very unjust, very unfair, and as I think very unwise. If it is apprehended that the President is going to veto the bill he will do it just as well with 30 per cent. off as in its present state. I confess that to my mind this proceeding is absolutely incomprehensible.

Before the motion is finally put I wish to ask the Chair if it would be in order to substitute the amendment which I had the honor to offer for the resolution that the bill be recommitted, and to give the committee instructions to report that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to recommit is not amendable by any amendment, but the instructions can be amended.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I offer this amendment as an amendment to the motion to instruct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

> That the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as can be judiciously expended during the current fiscal year, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of War to continue improvements on the principal and most important rivers and harbors in the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to expend the aforesaid appropriation, or so much thereof as can be judiciously expended, in continuing such improvements as may be most urgent and important, upon which work has been done and are now in progress of construction, and shall select such rivers and harbors as may be recommended by a board of five engineers of the Army, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, of which the Chief of Engineers shall be chairman.

Mr. McMILLAN. The motion submitted by me this morning was intended to economize time and facilitate the passage of the bill. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole has increased the amount of the bill so largely, and it was so large as it came from the House with amendments which the Senate committee deemed necessary, that we are of opinion the amount should be reduced. There are certain important items which the Committee on Commerce of the Senate deemed necessary to be inserted in the bill which had been omitted in the House. That of course required an addition to the amount of the House bill. But after those items were inserted, then they would take their proportion of any appropriation made even under the general reduction of the bill proposed by the motion which I have submitted.

This motion was made after consultation with reference to what will be the parliamentary condition of the bill upon its return from the committee to the Senate. While I do not profess to know anything of parliamentary law myself, yet the able parliamentarians of the Senate, some of them, are of the opinion that if the bill is committed under the motion submitted by me and reported forthwith to the Senate in accordance with the instructions of the Senate, the separate items of the bill would not be open to amendment, and that time would be economized in that respect. Otherwise the proposition would have been made by the committee to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert an amendment covering all the items in the bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is his own understanding that a bill reported back again from the committee to the Senate is not open to every amendment that the bill originally was? What I want is the Senator's own view about it, because I have a great deal of confidence in his opinions concerning all these matters. He was stating that possibly he did not understand as much parliamentary law as some others, but I wish to know what is his view about it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Of course, if the view suggested by me does not obtain, and when the bill is reported to the Senate every item would be subject to amendment, no time would be economized. However, upon that point I supposed the parliamentary law was otherwise, and therefore the motion was submitted; and in that view we desire to have it prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS obtained the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to submit a few observations, but I will yield if anybody has anything pressing.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish the Senator would permit me to offer my amendment as now modified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. While I am submitting my observations the Senator can put it into shape.

Mr. BUTLER. It is already in shape. I simply want to present it to the Chair with a view to action upon it. I move to strike out all after the word "instructions," in the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota, and to insert what I have marked in my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont wish to have it read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I understand what it means.

Mr. President, the river and harbor bill as it came from the House of Representatives appropriated, I think, the largest sum of money in the aggregate that had ever been contained in any one bill sent to the Senate by any House of Representatives for the improvement of rivers and harbors. I am not speaking from a critical examination of bills, but I am only speaking from my general impression. If any House of Representatives has beaten the present House of Representatives in swelling a river and harbor bill above fifteen million and some odd hundred thousand dollars I do not remember it. It may have happened; because when the Treasury is said to be full the patriotism of both Houses of Congress (for I can not allude to one alone) is so great, and our desire to see money properly distributed among the people where it will be useful is so strong, that we are naturally led to make the appropriations as liberal and as generous as possibly may be.

I think that this appropriation as it came from the House of Representatives is very much too large in its aggregate. It is too large in respect of the diversification of the objects to which the money is devoted. It takes in a great number of subjects, and streams, and places which for national objects truly considered and for national commerce among the States and with foreign nations it is substantially useless. But as a convenient condonation to the citizens and communities of remote places far away from railways, if they be—and many of them are not—it is a very nice and generous thing.

I can imagine that the people of the interior of New England, which has as many good streams in proportion to its size as any other part of the country, would be glad to have their little streams cleaned out; the floatage of logs and of timber would be vastly helped; but somehow or other the New England Representatives and Senators have not in general, or in particular so far as I know, felt at any time in the history of this Government that it was a part of the mission of the national Treasury to do that thing, or that it was a part of our mission to ask the national Congress to do it or to help us to do it. Perhaps we were wrong, but I have been brought up in that idea.

Therefore, without enumerating, as we have in the debates, two or three mere sample instances—it would take until December to go through with them all in detail, of course—I have felt and I feel now that the totality of this business, instead of being beneficial in this extreme way to the public interests at large, is injurious, and that it is teaching the people of the United States in its remotest interior districts, of Vermont or of Illinois or of Mississippi, or wherever, to be looking to the national Capitol and the national Treasury for everything that is to be done instead of depending upon themselves for their local prosperity, their local progress, and their local improvement.

I do not believe that is a good thing for a republic, and I believe the sooner we begin to be taught by the people of the United States and to teach them so far as they need it that the man who is to prosper in this world and the community that is to prosper must in respect of its immediate objects be taught to take care of itself, will have done a good work for the welfare and happiness and prosperity of the whole people.

When it comes to wide national objects, what is a real commerce and navigation between States, or a real commerce without navigation (because navigation is only a mere incident and part of commerce), a real and necessary intercourse between States that cover a continent from the Atlantic to the shores of the tranquil sea, then whatever is necessary to promote intercourse, exchange, travel, and products, unifying and solidifying the oneness of feeling that belongs to a common people, reserving their separate and independent local State rights, ought to be encouraged.

Now, where are you to draw the line? Our fathers began by drawing the line at a point that would take, I think, more than 50 per cent. out of this bill, that for all the objects which forty years ago by men as intelligent and patriotic as we are and by a people as intelligent and patriotic as we are, would be thought to have been within the competence of Congress, can be reached and accomplished with less than half the money there is in this bill.

But it is in the Senate as it is everywhere else in this world, I suppose, as it is in tax bills, and tariff bills, and everything else that affects the people. If I find that a tax is to be imposed upon some particular product of the community where I happen to reside and with whose special and local interests I am identified, I feel that an equal and a similar tax in some way should be imposed upon the products and industries of the rest of my brethren in the United States for the common purpose of us all. When some product of one State or community is to be protected I naturally feel, and every other Senator naturally feels, that in some just and equal relation the products and industries that need it of the communities with whom he is specially identified ought to be protected. That makes equality; and in general it is supposed you can not have it in any other way.

So when it is thought that a particular river in North Carolina is to be stirred up and dug out, &c., the representatives from Tennessee across the border feel, are not the rivers of Samaria as good as those of the Holy Land? And we must, therefore, have Tennessee attended to.

Mr. HOAR. Damascus.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Damascus is in the Holy Land.

Mr. HOAR. But not in Samaria.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in Samaria. The other river was in Samaria, though I admit that my knowledge of what my friend from Massachusetts is speaking of is not so accurate as his is.

Mr. LOGAN. You are right, however.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose I am; but I refer to the matter generally. So from Tennessee it goes to the next State, and by and by it reaches another and another (I only start in the center of the country to illustrate the idea), and as was stated by the Senator from Illinois last night so well and so carefully, the upshot of it is that in spite of ourselves apparently, and without meaning to be under a bias and without any log-rolling or trading and "help-you-me and I-will-help-you" feeling at all, but somehow or other the outcome is that every stream and every strait that anybody has the face to suggest nearly is first surveyed, to which nobody made any objection last year, and being surveyed, as they say on the canals, you have got within locking distance and are entitled to go through next; and so they all get into the bill.

Now, they all being in the bill and on what the committee and the Senate acting as in Committee of the Whole (which is the same thing as the Senate for all practical purposes) have determined to be a suitable ratio as between one and another, and as it is impossible, as I have found by dear experience, dear to those who have heard me as well as to myself, to get out those things which ought not to be in at all, the only way is to economize and reduce the aggregate in such a way as that moderate operations can go on and something can be saved to the Treasury and to the general public interest, in the hope that when we come to consider the subject again we can find that some and many of these streams, as happens, as is seen from the reports of the engineers, are reported to be unworthy of any improvement, turn out to be incapable of improvement, turn out to be inefficient and useless when improved, when we can bring ourselves, I hope, into a frame of mind to drop them, and go on with those objects of public expenditure which are really advantageous, not to a locality, not even to a State as a State alone, but to the nation as a nation, and to all the States in their operations and those of their people between each other and with foreign countries.

Therefore it is that I wish to test the sense of the Senate upon it and save time, whatever should be the rule when this bill comes back, if the Senate is of the opinion that it ought to be cut down; if not we shall know where we are. Whatever may be the outcome, if the Senate is of opinion that this thing ought to be done we shall then have a determinate guide upon which to proceed and to get on with the matter, in order that the bill in some way may be acted upon between the two Houses.

With the opinions I have expressed (and I mean to condense all I can, for I have not occupied much time on this bill) I should have felt and I now feel that the best thing to do is to do in substance, and for aught I know in form, what the Senator from South Carolina has proposed. I have had an amendment of precisely the same character in my desk since this bill has been reported.

But there are grave objections to it, as there are grave objections to the bill as it stands. It leaves it to the discretion of the executive department alone to determine in what places and what States and upon what objects so large a sum as $10,000,000 should be expended. It is a dangerous power, but it is a power which has been conferred upon Presidents before, and when so conferred, so far as I know, it has not been abused. It is capable of abuse; but if it were left to myself alone, with the notions I have expressed about the bill in question, I should rather run the risk, whatever it may be, of such an abuse than to appropriate three, four, five, or six million dollars for objects that when you look them one by one right in the face do not to my mind appear to come within our constitutional or political province of expending money upon.

But as it is, having expressed this opinion, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to try the sense of the Senate on the question of reducing this bill, and if afterward it shall seem to be best to go still further and do what the Senator from South Carolina proposes, then I will consider that, having expressed the opinion I have about it already.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have heard at each recurring session of Congress these homilies, for I can term them nothing else, in regard to the river and harbor bill. I simply wish to say that there is but one of two courses for the Senate or for the Congress of the United States to adopt. The one is to put this matter entirely in the hands of the Engineer Bureau and the President of the United States, to attempt the framing of no bill at all for the improvement of rivers and harbors; and the other is to adhere to the present system.

If Congress sees proper to abrogate its power to construct a river and harbor bill, let it do so; but I say now that is an absolute pretense, it is the sheerest moonshine nonsense that was ever talked even in a lunatic asylum, in my judgment, to say that you can construct a river and harbor bill and ignore the principles of human nature and the motives of mankind.

I have heard here again and again essays upon the constitutionality of this bill, and appeals to the patriotism and the esthetic feeling of members of the committee and members of the Senate. Who expects a Senator or a Representative to ignore the improvements in his State? The man who expects it looks for a Utopia in politics that never will exist in this country. There never has been a time and there never will be a time when the same motives and the same principles will not move and actuate men, in committee and out of committee, that have formed the river and harbor bills in the past and will form them in the future.

All this talk about the committee on river and harbors is the merest bosh and nonesense. The river and harbor committee has thirteen Senators upon it, who are moved by the same influences and motives with the rest of their colleagues in this Chamber; and the combination does not stop in the committee. Sir, I have known reverend and grave Senators to come before the river and harbor committee and beg for improvements; they have taken me outside and buttonholed me and appealed to me on personal grounds and said, "If I do not get this appropriation I am beaten in the next election. There are a lot of young fellows after my place, and you must help me out, VEST, or I am gone. 'Help me, Cassius, or I sink.'" I have helped them, and then they have come into the Chamber, and after the amendment was put on the bill they have stood up within three feet of me and denounced the whole scheme of the bill as a piece of unconstitutional corruption. My colleagues know the men. It has been done over and over again in my seven years' experience on the Commerce Committee.

Mr. President, you talk about combinations. They do not stop with the committee. Combinations have been made on this floor in regard to this very bill. "You help me and I will help you." "Put up my appropriations, and I will help you put up yours." I have had Senators come to me and say, "VEST, you were right in your argument on the Kentucky River, but I was in the gang and could not leave the procession. I got my part of the pork, and I had to help somebody else to get his. After I pay my debts I will then help the committee." And so it will be to the end of time, just as long as men are men, and are governed by the passions and prejudices and interests that always govern humanity.

The Senator from Vermont talks about New England and her self-abnegation. Take this bill, sir, and New England in proportion to population has got more than her share. Even my friend from Vermont unbended from his magisterial dignity and appeared before that committee and asked for an increase of an appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. And he did right. I am not speaking of it in any critical sense. I would have done it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my honorable friend pardon me, if I may interrupt him?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think he referred to Vermont in proportion to population, or was it some other State in proportion to their population?

Mr. VEST. I said the whole of New England.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state about Vermont, which is a small part of New England, that the port, the appropriation for the breakwater as it came from the House being $15,000, where that breakwater is being constructed, brings into the Treasury of the United States about a million dollars a year from the customs duties of its commerce, that district of Vermont; and therefore it being on a lake which for 150 miles divides two States and which opens into a foreign country it might be considered fairly not a local lake but a place of some national importance.

Mr. VEST. I do not doubt it. I voted for the increase; I could not resist the arguments of the Senator from Vermont; but there is not a trout stream in this bill, there is not a so-called harbor that would give refuge to a fishing-smack of ten tons that is not a national improvement, if you listen to the Senators and Representatives from those States; and if you do not give it an appropriation Liberty lies bleeding in the streets and the Capitol will be shattered to its foundations. It is always so; and you can not make these river and harbor bills in any other way.

Now, what is the result of this motion? The Senators who have gone in and demanded all and got all will only be reduced 30 per cent., and those of us, if there are any of us, who have stood back and said in the public interest, "Do not increase this bill; let us be moderate about it in order to avoid a veto," we are cut down 30 per cent. also.

What is the use of having the deliberation of a committee? What is the use of having a Senate to pass upon the action of that committee? Why not meet the whole thing logically and say to the President, "We are unfit to discharge this duty; you take it, with your Cabinet, and discharge it for us?" That is the legitimate result of it. You just take a knife and slice off 30 per cent. of this whole bill. There are appropriations in here which ought never to have had a place in the bill, which I think I can demonstrate to any unprejudiced jury have no more right to be here than I have to be in the Parliament of Great Britain to-day. Yet they are here, and under the resolution or motion of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce 30 per cent. simply is taken off of them, leaving two-thirds; while a great improvement like the Mississippi River loses $800,000, the Ohio River loses nearly $200,000, and the Missouri River $200,000, and these others that have no place and should have no place in the bill simply receive a like verdict and a similar result. If we want to abnegate our parliamentary or legislative function let us do so and say to the people of the United States we are unfit and incapable to perform this duty.

If the Committee on Commerce had stood to this bill as they should have done we would have passed it as it came from the committee; but, like a militia company, we scattered on the first fire. On the first amendment which was acted upon there were not more than half the committee sustaining it, and they have been voting against their own bill, and we have had the legitimate result of disaster and defeat, and the bill has been made by the enemies of the bill itself. Now we are reaping the result in a motion coming from the chairman of the committee to cut off 30 per cent. from his own deliberate judgment. I am against it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota and the Committee on Commerce to the position in which they inevitably place their bill if the motion of the Senator from Minnesota shall be agreed to. I call attention to clause 2 of Rule XV, a part of which I will read:

> It shall be in order at any time before the passage of any bill or resolution, to move its commitment; and when the bill or resolution shall again be reported from the committee, it shall be placed on the Calendar, and when again considered by the Senate, it shall be as in Committee of the Whole.

Now, recommit your bill, and when you report it back it takes its place on the Calendar, and when you can get consideration at all we go over the one, two, or three weeks, as we have been going over the discussion of these questions for two weeks, and finally it may be again reported to the Senate. But I warn the Senator that it will have to be dealt with according to the rules, if it is recommitted and rereported back.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I wish to make but a remark in reference to the proceeding which is proposed by the Committee on Commerce, not by way of criticising their action, for I have no criticisms to make except those that come to me as logical conclusions from the propositions which have been presented to the Senate.

Taking the bill as a whole, I agree with the Senator from Vermont and with what has been said by the Senator from Missouri, that there are many things in it which ought not to appear in the bill. That is not strange, for I think there never has been a bill passed known as a river and harbor bill that did not have certain items in it which were thought by many to be improperly in the bill.

But the argument of the Senator from Vermont was that these things that were in the bill being improper, some time or other the Senate would come to a conclusion, a sensible conclusion we might say, and would strike off all of them, and then we should appropriate money simply for navigable streams and for the benefit and protection of harbors.

The Senator has more confidence in human nature than I have if he believes such a time will ever come when the Congress of the United States will strike off everything except navigable streams and rivers and harbors. I wish we had commenced that way. I wish that was the proposition now, because that is my theory of a river and harbor bill, and I have usually voted against such bills on that ground. But finding, as the Senator from Vermont will find sooner or later, that there is no use in fighting those propositions, that they naturally come into such a bill and you can not prevent it, I desisted from it, leaving to the committee on rivers and harbors to report such a bill as they deemed in their wisdom right. It being composed of thirteen intelligent gentlemen, I took it for granted that they knew more about it after they made the examinations than I could know.

But there is one singular thing connected with this proposition. The House recommends to the whole Congress that we appropriate about $14,000,000 or $15,000,000. That is to say, they have appropriated for certain streams, harbors, &c., that amount. The Senate conclude that there are other works that ought to be continued, that there are other works which ought to be commenced, that there are other surveys which ought to be made, and therefore they have added to the bill what in their judgment it is right to do. Doubtless the committee did not put anything in the bill that they thought was wrong. Therefore they believe that the whole bill is right.

Now, if the Committee on Commerce, composed of thirteen men, men wise, men intelligent, believe it to be right, I ask the chairman why they consent to agree in the face of the country that they have done a wrong, and are willing to admit here in the face of the whole country that they have put matters in this bill which were not justified and which ought not to be in it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no such admission on the part of the committee by any step they have taken.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I do not mean it in any offensive sense, but I look upon it as a logical conclusion that almost all people will come to that when the committee and the Senate recommit the bill they admit before the country that they have undertaken to appropriate money they are not justified in appropriating. I can not look at it in any other light. I can not see it any other way.

Why is it done, sir? The men who have been opposed to this bill from its inception to the present time have been busy here day in and day out for the purpose of getting up enough men to encourage them to agree to stand to the proposition to recommit, until the committee, forced in some way or other either by a fear that their bill would be defeated by some means or other, were driven to this position to the acknowledgment that they have made an appropriation of about $3,000,000 more than ought to be made for the works that were demanded and represented by the Engineer Corps of the Army of the United States as objects of appropriation.

After I commence a proposition, I know it is much to my own injury many times that I am not inclined to back down as readily as I perhaps ought; but I can not help it; that is my nature; and I say that if I was that committee I would let the bill be strangled and throttled before I would make the admission before the country that I had sat there for weeks and months putting appropriations on the bill that would not stand criticism, and therefore they were driven from their position and agreed to take 30 per cent. of a horizontal cut off the bill.

Now, let me illustrate this proposition. Here on this bill we have a committee of thirteen. There are certain improvements in this country which are sufficiently appropriated for in the bill. There are certain others which are not sufficiently appropriated for. When you come to cut them down 30 per cent. by a horizontal slice, what is the effect? It is not that you cut across that way and that the long ones are cut off more than the short ones, if I may use that term; in other words, that the heavy appropriations are cut off more than the short ones so far as percentage is concerned, but you move them all up even, those that have a proper appropriation and those that have not. You cut them off even, and therefore the ones which are insufficiently appropriated for are damaged in the operation, while those which are sufficiently appropriated for can stand it. That is the effect of it. So it almost wipes out some of the appropriations. One that I mentioned to-day it cuts down until it amounts to nothing on earth, until the work will have to stop in a short time to the damage of the work that is being done, and it is a great and important work to the commerce of the country.

There is another phase in connection with this which strikes me very strangely. If the intention was by the committee and is by the Senate to play shuttlecock with some other branch of the Government somewhere not to be mentioned, so as to see which one can cut under the other and find which one can be the more economical, I would have made the bill that way at first. I would have done it, as the common phrase is, on a square deal. I would not have done it by bringing in a bill of this character and then be driven by the opponents of their work from that purpose, papers and measures being signed to secure it, to force men to admit what I have said.

It is true there ought not to be any political jugglery about a bill of this kind. I will not say that there is, but it is a fact which can not be denied that the cutting down of this bill 30 per cent. brings it below the appropriation made by the House. What is that for? Do you suppose it will stay there in the committee of conference? You first come in and say the House has not appropriated sufficiently; you add $3,000,000 to it; then you cut off $4,000,000 and bring it below the appropriation of the House. I can not understand the logic of that. I can not understand the nerve which causes that to be done. I can not understand why it shall be done unless it is as I say playing shuttlecock, one House with the other to see which one can undercut the other. I do not believe in that.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there? The effect of the whole business is to place the making of the river and harbor bill in the hands of six men, because by this proposition every solitary provision, every item in the river and harbor bill put in by the House will be placed before the committee of conference.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, there is no doubt about that. That is just what I was saying, that it would not remain before the committee of conference as it will come back from the Committee of Commerce if it is recommitted, for the reason that each and every proposition put in by the House will have been amended, so that every proposition that came from the House will be open to amendment before the committee of conference. It is not striking out one appropriation that gives a million dollars and leaving in another one that gives a hundred thousand, but you amend each and every proposition by reducing it 30 per cent., so that each and every proposition in the bill will be open to the action of the committee of conference, and when it comes back to the Senate it will be a bill unknown heretofore so far as its strippings and cuttings and razeeings are concerned, and certain things stricken out. A man who can not understand this it seems to me is very dull.

So far as any fears of what might happen to the bill hereafter are concerned, what business is that of ours? What have we to do with any department of the Government save that to which we belong? What right have we to question, what right have we to insinuate, what right have we to determine or believe that any particular action will be taken in any direction whatever in reference to this bill? We have no right to assert or intimate or form an opinion in reference to it, for we have nothing to form it upon. So the thing for us to do is to perform the duty incumbent upon us as we believe it should be performed and leave the balance where it belongs afterward without concerning ourselves in reference to it.

I may be among the very few, but it makes no difference. I advocated only one or two propositions in the bill. I believed they were honest; I believed they were correct. I took the judgment of the committee for the rest. I have committed myself to the bill as it was agreed on by the Senate, and believing I was right in doing it, I shall not be driven from my position in reference to it. If there are only a half dozen to stand by the bill I do not propose to vote for this proposition.

I did not dream of this action until yesterday evening, when it was suggested to me by a gentleman that probably this would be the course. I did not think it could be possible from what I had heard said by the committee, and I did not believe it.

Still it has been done; and I say now, and I say it not by way of criticism, but I say it because I believe it, that if that committee had stood by the bill as they reported it the opposition would have been confined to the Senators who have been making this raid on it for the purpose of defeating it, and it would have had a majority. Then a committee of conference could have agreed on certain amendments which had been made; that is to say, it would have been the agreement of the two Houses, and the bill would have been in a great deal better shape in my judgment than it is now proposed to place it.

I do not claim to be a parliamentarian. Every one knows that I do not bother myself with questions about parliamentary law, and for that reason perhaps my word will be taken when I say that I do not investigate it as thoroughly as other gentlemen. There are gentlemen who do understand it, but I always find that they differ in reference to rules and everything of the kind when their interests differ. So I am confounded sometimes in reference to it; but if my opinion was worth anything at all, I would say that when this bill comes back from the committee it will then be as it was when reported from the committee first; that it will be subject to debate and subject to amendment just exactly as it was when it was originally brought from the committee to the Senate; and unless there is a majority to override that rule and close the mouth of every Senator here who is concerned in reference to having the bill adopted, I think the Senate will find or the committee will find that they will have about as much trouble to pass the bill when they bring it back as they have had to pass it at this time, and I think a little more.

I do not say this by way of criticising the committee. Far be it from me to do that, for I believe they are honorable and intelligent gentlemen. They have done the best they could about it. I think they have been unnecessarily alarmed about the fate of their bill. That is my honest judgment, and I believe that is what has caused this proposition to be made. I think that is the reason for this proposed action.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, if I had ever had any doubt about the wisdom of the amendment which I had the honor to offer, that doubt has been entirely removed by what we have seen here to-day. While there are a great many provisions of the bill which do not meet my approval, some of which I have resisted with all the veto efforts I could command, I was inclined to abide by the action of the majority of the Senate and vote for the bill upon its final passage; but I anticipated several days ago what has happened this morning, that the friends of this bill would practically abandon it and rely upon a committee of conference for a river and harbor bill, thereby practically admitting that the Senate is incapable of preparing a river and harbor bill. For one I do not intend to subject myself to the charge of self-stultification by voting to recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce, for that is what in my judgment it practically amounts to.

We have been here for two weeks acting deliberately and solemnly upon each provision of the bill, in a majority of cases calling the yeas and nays upon all the contested points, and at the eleventh hour we hear a motion from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce with instructions to scale the appropriations 30 per cent. The Senator from Vermont, who has never concealed his enmity and hostility to the bill, does not deny that there are many provisions in it which ought not to be in it, measures which he has denounced as pernicious, as vicious, as unwise, and yet he proposes by his vote to condone for a wrong which he himself admits is in the bill, by striking at the meritorious measures and scaling down the wise and the unwise, the righteous and the unrighteous alike.

Mr. President, is that legislation? What will the world say of the Senate having devoted, as I have said, two weeks to the consideration of this measure, to come in now and impair the appropriations for meritorious measures about which there is no dispute, and, as my friend from Missouri says, strike down $800,000 from the Mississippi River, $200,000 from the Missouri River, simply for the purpose of committing some kind of legerdemain? I do not know exactly how to characterize it. My friend from Illinois said it was a game of shuttlecock and battledore with the House of Representatives, practically admitting that we are unfit and unable and unequal to the duty of preparing a river and harbor bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I interrupt you?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In respect of the point of the Senator from South Carolina that this is going to cripple the expenditure so as to injure a good work, I beg to suggest to him what everybody knows, I only need to state it, that these river and harbor bills are not bills that are limited to years like the ordinary appropriation bills for the Government. No one of these appropriations lapses; it is a continuous work; and if it is found next December, take the Mississippi River for instance, that they have been able to judiciously and properly expend the amount that the bill contains and they need more money to go on, all Congress has got to do is to pass a bill to do it. It does not cripple anybody.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, but——

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only a very short time from now until December, and I am afraid it will be shorter before we finish this session.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that perfectly well, but I do not agree with the Senator. I think very many of these items are for important national improvements to which money enough is not appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is money enough for the time from now to December.

Mr. BUTLER. I think not. I could select a dozen improvements, if I had time and chose to detain the Senate, and could demonstrate that the appropriations that have been made have been wholly inadequate for the work required, and that absolute loss has been entailed upon the Government by inadequate appropriations. Now it is proposed by these horizontal reductions to cut those appropriations down still further, and at the same time scale those items which the Senate admits ought not to be in the bill.

I submit that that is not judicious legislation; it is not wise. I would infinitely prefer that the amendment which I have offered should prevail and commit to the executive department of the Government a duty which we ourselves confess we are unfit to discharge, because I believe, at least I assume, that the Secretary of War, with the board of five engineers provided for in that amendment, would run through the debates upon this bill and select so far as may be such improvements as demand a large amount of money, permanent in their nature, and that they would apply the money to these, and obviate precisely what the Senator from Vermont says the bill creates, that is to say, the distributing of a vast amount of money to unimportant creeks and bayous and canals which are not national in their character.

I do not sympathize with that idea. I have always supported the river and harbor bill. I intended to support this and expect now to support it unless, as I said a while ago, we are guilty of the self-stultification of recommitting it to the Committee on Commerce after we have devoted so much time to it. I trust that the Senate will not do so. I agree with the Senator from Illinois that all we can do is to discharge our duty here and leave to other departments of the Government the discharge of theirs. We have no right to anticipate that the President will veto the bill or otherwise. We must assume that he will not do so.

Therefore I submit that it will be infinitely better that we go on with this bill as it is and perfect it as best we can, according to the best lights before us, send it to a committee of conference, where it properly belongs, and act upon their report, and then send it to the President. That would seeem to me to be the natural, sensible, orderly, wise, judicious course to pursue.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose at this time of the discussion to follow the line of observation which was pursued by the Senator from Vermont. I think he is mistaken in his belief that any considerable number of items will be found in the bill which are not important to national commerce. If any Senator thinks otherwise, in my judgment when the bill is read as it comes from the committee it is his duty to take the item, to give the Senate his information about it at the time, and have it debated, and have the committee make their explanation and defense, and not simply when the matter is gone by indulge in a general statement of the enormity of the river and harbor bill without any specification of detail or particulars. But that question is not before us for discussion at the present time.

I am opposed to the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina to commit $10,000,000 to the Executive with authority to spend it upon such public works in the country as he may deem proper. In my judgment that would set a very injurious precedent in legislation. It is a precedent which might be abused by Executives hereafter, though I have great confidence that the present Secretary of War, if anybody, would be a person to be intrusted with such a function.

Mr. BUTLER. It has been done before.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is a very bad thing to do.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it has been done with the consent of the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I expressed very emphatically a few years ago my objection. I think it was never done. It was proposed once or twice before. You talk about executive patronage; you talk about seeking to divorce the patronage of the Government from politics. What patronage in the power of an ambitious President or an ambitious Secretary is like that which authorizes him to cause the prosperity of whole communities, of the entire population along the banks of a river, or a great city, knowing that they are to owe their superior prosperity over a rival, a rival route of commerce, to the interposition of an Executive? I could hardly conceive a more objectionable principle to establish in legislation; and I should not be willing to help establish it in consequence of any particular necessity.

I think the rule which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has read shows very clearly that if the instructions proposed by the Senator from Minnesota be adopted, when the bill comes back to the Senate it must wait one day like all reports of committees, of course, and then must go again to the Committee of the Whole, and again to the Senate, passing through all its amendable stages as an original bill. That is very clearly the result of the express rule of the Senate, it seems to me, and it is also very clearly the parliamentary law, as I understand it, in the absence of an express rule. Cushing on Parliamentary Law makes a statement which I should like to read. He says:

> It is by means of an instruction to the committee that the form of a bill is changed, as by making two bills into one, or dividing one into two or more. Instructions to form two bills into one are, in general, mandatory, sometimes enabling merely; to divide one bill into two or more, appear always to be enabling. In turning one bill into two, or in making two bills into one, the committee does not perform the part of a mere scrivener, but reports the amendments proper for those purposes, as in other cases.

Then follows:

> Amendments, in pursuance of mandatory instructions, stand upon the same footing with other amendments, and must be reported upon by the committee and acted upon by the House in the same manner.

Thomas Erskine May goes further (I will not detain the Senate under the five-minute rule by reading) and implies very strongly that even where certain instructions are given to a committee, mandatory instructions, the committee deal with them with a sort of discretion, and that the question must be put even in the committee. He also implies very strongly that mandatory instructions in regard to a mere matter of legislation within the legislative discretion of the House, as distinct from waiving some want of power or some special rule of procedure, have gone into disuse and are now unknown in English parliamentary practice.

What I should like is an amendment which I shall move if I have an opportunity, or which if the Senator should withdraw his motion I would move as an amendment to the bill independently of that, which I will now read:

Provided, That not more than 70 per cent. of the amount appropriated to any item of this bill shall be expended unless the Secretary of War shall certify in regard to such item that in his opinion a larger expenditure is necessary to prevent waste or loss in completing the work.

That would have the effect of providing for cases where the item of appropriation is one made to complete a work, a small work, where $5,000 would complete the work, and where the postponing of the expenditure of 30 per cent. of that for another year would require the cost and waste of removing the dredging-machines and so on, but for the general bill it would be a reduction of 30 per cent. of the amount now proposed by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAXEY obtained the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator yield to me to make a conference report?

Mr. MAXEY. Certainly.

EVIDENCE IN CERTAIN STATE CLAIMS.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 71) "for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1 and 3 and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 2, and agree to the same with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "copy," in line 14, down to and including the word "evidence," in line 18, where it occurs a second time, and insert in lieu thereof the words "of such paper may be certified by the proper officers of such State or Territory under their seals of office, or, if such copy can not be furnished, any other competent secondary evidence of the contents of such paper;" And add at the end of the section the following words: "All provisions of this section applicable to States shall be equally applicable to the Territories;" and the House agree to the same.

J. N. DOLPH,
JNO. C. SPOONER,
GEO. GRAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. R. TUCKER,
D. B. CULBERSON,
L. B. CASWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend, as it would be useless and perhaps improper, to resist the adoption of this report. I see that there appears to remain in the bill a provision for taking any kind of information almost when a document shall be missing, not shown to be lost or destroyed but out of sight. It looks to me like pretty loose legislation in providing means for paying claims upon some kind of a public treasury. I only make the observation so that somebody will not shake his gory locks at me hereafter and say I assented to it.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the Senator from Oregon would explain to us what the effect of the conference report is—what effect it has upon the bill, and how it changes the bill. I suppose he can do it in a few words.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill was intended to authorize the Secretary of War—either the present incumbent or his predecessor supposed he was not authorized without some legislation to do that—to receive secondary evidence in the case of the loss of original papers; but the House committee thought the language was too broad for that purpose, and they amended the bill so as to require a certified copy in all cases where there had been a loss of an original paper. Of course that would prevent the proof of any claim, because there can not be a certified copy where the original was lost. The conference committee have agreed that a certified copy shall be furnished if it exists, and if the original is lost, upon proof of that fact and that there is no certified copy in existence, other competent secondary evidence may be received by the Secretary of War to establish the contents of the lost paper.

It is simply the rule that obtains in courts of justice applied to the proof of these claims.

The report was concurred in.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OSHKOSH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 57) for the erection of a public building at Oshkosh, Wis., which were, in lines 4 and 5 of the bill to strike out the words "internal-revenue office;" and in line 9, after the word "dollars," to insert the following words:

Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now read the bill as it will stand amended unless it is to be referred.

Mr. SAWYER. No; I am going to move to concur.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let the bill be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, by private sale or condemnation, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit court, post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Oshkosh, Wis. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $100,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and that no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Wisconsin shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein. For the purposes of this act the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2475) to amend an act approved May 25, 1882, entitled "An act for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Tex.," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CONGER, Mr. DOLPH, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. KENNA, Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK, Mr. BLAIR, Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. JONES, of Nevada, and Mr. PALMER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 126) directing payment of the surplus in the Treasury on the public debt; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the question being on the motion of Mr. MCMILLAN that the bill be committed to the Committee on Commerce with instructions to amend the same as voted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, except that in respect of the sum of money in each and every item and head of appropriation and the sum of the aggregate thereof contained in the bill and in the amendments agreed upon by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole shall be reduced 30 per cent. of the amounts thereof respectively, and that said committee amend said bill accordingly and not otherwise, and report the same complete forthwith.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the bill under consideration reached the Senate on the 10th day of May last, was promptly referred on that day to the Committee on Commerce, and remained in that committee under investigation from that time until the 28th of June, and was then reported back to the Senate. We have been engaged here day after day and to a late hour of the day, and last night to the hour of midnight, considering this bill as reported from the Committee on Commerce; and now a proposition comes in at this late hour that a horizontal reduction of 30 per cent. shall be made throughout the entire bill. What is the effect of that? A very large number of the items which came from the other House, after mature consideration by the committee of the House and by the House itself, and after careful consideration by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate were left in the bill by that committee precisely as they came from the House. So far in Committee of the Whole every one of those items, without comment, without objection, has been left in the bill by the Senate precisely as the Committee on Commerce reported them. So that we have, in so far as the unobjected items are concerned, the concurrence of the House of Representatives and the concurrence of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate and the concurrence so far of the Senate itself.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Texas will permit me to call his attention to that statement. I think he is mistaken in the statement he has made. The Senate in Committee of the Whole have increased this bill over the recommendations of the Committee on Commerce nearly half a million dollars.

Mr. MAXEY. I have not spoken of that. I will show the Senator in charge of this bill what I mean in a moment, and that I am not mistaken.

I repeat what I said before, that a large part of the items which came from the House, which were examined and approved by the Committee on Commerce, which were reported by that committee back to this House, have been approved by the Senate without being touched in a single letter, word, syllable, or character. Every one of those items to which I refer has been left in the bill precisely as it came from the House and precisely as it came from the Committee on Commerce.

What justice, therefore, is there in reducing these unobjected items 30 per cent.? Both Houses have passed upon them. The Senate, so far, is satisfied with them. Why should these unobjected items be cut down because increases have been made in other items of the bill?

After all that, after the House has passed these items after full consideration, after the Committee on Commerce has passed them, after the Senate has examined them, and all hands agree that in so far as these items are concerned there could be no question or dispute, now what is the proposition? That the bill shall be sent back to the Committee on Commerce with a peremptory instruction that these items which have been passed upon by all who have examined them and have not been amended, have not been increased, have not been diminished, shall share the fate of those that have been amended by the committee and by the Senate, or which have been increased by the Senate since the bill came back.

That seems to me a very strange business transaction, that the entire judgment of the committee which unanimously concurred in so far as those items are concerned with the House, which submitted to this body in the form of a report that those items were right, and the Senate has indorsed and approved the action of the committee and declared by their votes that they were right, that those items thus passed upon shall share the same fate as the disputed items. Does that seem fair?

Should this proposition prevail every item in this bill, from the first item in it to the last, becomes in its very nature and character an amendment of the action of the House, and the whole of it is thus thrown into the control of a conference committee. It does seem to me that as a business proposition there is less reason in that than anything I have heard.

But it has been said by some that there are items in this bill which never should have crept into it; that they are wrong. Will you exclude any item from this bill by the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee? Not at all. Every item which has been denounced in the bill, from the first to the last, remains under that motion in the bill, and suffers precisely the same fate, no worse, as the best and the most approved items in the bill. Is there any justice or business in that?

Take the great harbor of New York, the great harbor of Norfolk, the great harbor of Savannah, the great harbor of Galveston, and other harbors that all admit should be improved, according to the proposition of the chairman of the committee every one of these items goes down 30 per cent. along with those streams which have been so denounced as unworthy of a place in the bill; so that it is treating the just and the unjust, if any be unjust, the meritorious and unworthy, if any be unworthy, alike. Mr. President, as a business proposition, I never have heard of one that struck me as having less practical sense.

I oppose the proposition, first, because it has no business in it; and second, because I am not alarmed at the size of this bill. I say here and now if the Commerce Committee, of which the presiding officer [Mr. FRYE] is an honored member, had reported a larger appropriation for really meritorious works I would have voted for it cheerfully.

From the foundation of the Government the Congress of the United States has assumed commercial jurisdiction over the great navigable rivers and over the harbors of this country, and of late years and for many years Congress has assumed the entire commercial jurisdiction over the navigable rivers and over the harbors, and has been exercising that jurisdiction over these rivers and over these harbors. It is, in its very nature and by the very terms of the Constitution, exclusive jurisdiction; and thus the States which are blessed with harbors and blessed with navigable streams can not improve those as they desire they should be without asking the consent of Congress, without proceeding in the manner prescribed by Congress.

All they can do is to make an appropriation and put the money of the State in the improvements in the mode and manner directed by Congress, because not only do I think the Constitution is entirely clear in and of itself, but numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have conclusively settled that the navigable streams and harbors of this country are as necessarily a part of the commerce clause of the Constitution as the ship is or any other instrumentality of commerce; but when Congress exercises that jurisdiction it is in its nature exclusive. The States therefore are practically inhibited from taking any part in their improvement, unless they voluntarily advance their own money, which Congress does not need or ask for, and which the States are pretty apt not to do.

What did we do last year? A river and harbor bill passed the House of Representatives and came here, and for some reason or other it never was reported back from the Committee on Commerce in time to be examined, and the result was that it was lost. What followed? All the unfinished works, wherever they were, where the Government of the United States had invested hundreds of thousands of dollars of the money of the people in those works, were left in that unfinished condition, and every man who knows anything about such works, or indeed any structure, knows that when work, whether under ground or above ground, whether under water or above water, is left in an incomplete and an unfinished condition, subject to the storms, to the winds, to the floods, and to the waves and all the casualties which can injure unfinished property, it is the worst of business to leave that property in that unfinished condition; and the very result of failing to pass the river and harbor bill at the last Congress was that the United States Government lost hundreds of thousands of dollars by the impairment of work which had been begun and partially completed.

The country is growing rapidly, and there is an absolute need for the improvement of your rivers and your harbors, and every year that you neglect it is a loss to the American people.

We hear a great deal of talk well founded about the power of railroads, the power of monopolies, the control which they have over the commerce of the country. Mr. President, the best competitor that ever was made, or ever will be made, to contend against railroads is that competitor which the God of nature has given us in the form of navigable streams and harbors, giving free ingress and egress to the commerce of the world. They are the natural competitors; and we are neglecting our duty if we fail to avail ourselves of these natural arteries of commerce by improving them and removing from them all obstructions which prevent their free navigation. So that I am not deterred from voting for the bill on account of its size.

You must bear in mind that this bill ought to have double or more than double the amount of an ordinary annual river and harbor bill, because we had none last year, and four years ago we had another bill which passed through both Houses of Congress and was vetoed; and thus by the veto and by the neglect of Congress to pass a bill last year, our works have been continually deteriorating and will continue to deteriorate, and it is the worst of folly to continue in this reckless course. No sensible business man would treat his own property as we treat the rivers and harbors of this country.

Why has this been brought about? There was raised a few years ago a hue and cry and a storm generated by the most selfish purposes, designed and intended to compel Congress not to pass river and harbor bills, not to bring the water ways of this land in competition with the railways of the land. That was the bottom and foundation of that great hue and cry that was raised against the river and harbor bill. It was founded on that selfish desire to compel the people of this country to pay higher rates of freight, higher rates of travel than they would be required to pay had the water ways of the country been free. That is the secret of it; that is the foundation of it; and those men who assume to be the special, peculiar, and great friends of the people, who cry out against monopoly, ought to bear in mind that the true, legitimate, and best method of meeting these monopolies is to take that great water way which God gave us and put it in suitable condition to compete with railways. Give this relief, and put on as many other brakes as the Constitution and wise legislation will justify.

I am opposed to the proposition as made by the chairman of the committee. I am opposed to backing down from the work we have done. I believe the Senate of the United States has acted in the main wisely and well on this bill. There are items in the bill which I voted against, but my judgment as to some of those items was not approved by the Senate. In a bill of this kind, aggregated of a great many different and distinct items, it would be next to impossible to get any bill without having in it here and there an item that did not meet your judgment.

Improve the harbors on the Atlantic and Gulf front, so as to give free ingress and egress to the great sea-going ships, and trade centers with direct trade with the markets of the world will spring up. Competition among these trade centers will make trade healthful, and you break up the monopoly which a few trade centers have over the importing, exporting, banking, and insurance business of the country, and this country will thrive by healthful competition as it never did before.

But the great principle at last is: Is the bill as a whole beneficial to the American people? Does it aid materially and at a reasonable cost in removing the obstructions from your rivers, deepening your harbors, and putting them in a better condition to trade with the nations of the earth? I take the faults in the bill as I take the spots on the sun's disk, for, although they are there, the great god of day gives light and heat. I take these spots although they be on the bill, because the bill, as a whole, is a good bill and will result to the benefit of the people. It will aid the people in that great struggle for cheap freight and cheap travel. I therefore oppose the motion of the Senator from Minnesota. I shall oppose the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], and I shall vote to pass the bill precisely as the House sent it to us amended by the Senate committee and as further amended by the Senate itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish, although the question is not precisely the point now, but before the matter passes away, to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as to what would be the state of this bill when reported back again if the motion of the Senator from Minnesota should be agreed to. I think it capable of demonstration under parliamentary law, when you look into the precedents and authorities, that where the Senate has ordered a committee, instead of the Secretary, to make a particular amendment, and that amendment is reported as made in obedience to the order of the Senate (just as when the Senate orders a bill to be engrossed it is reported by the Committee on Engrossed Bills as duly engrossed and no further vote of the Senate is had upon it), it would have effect as the action of the Senate and the amendment would be made.

The section from Cushing that was read by the Senator from Massachusetts where he states it broadly and apparently in support of the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, stands in exact opposition to an earlier section, which speaks of special and particular amendments of words that are directed by the body to be made by a committee on a recommitment, where he says that in obedience to that command those words have been stricken out or inserted, and the bill is then reported, that it starts right on from that point just as if the amendment had been made in the Senate or in the parliamentary body, whatever it is, and on referring to the Congressional Globe, which Mr. Cushing cites, for the general proposition of mandatory amendments being an open question, I find that the authority does not support the proposition at all.

There on an appropriation bill in the House of Representatives a gentleman moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to strike out all the items in the appropriation that were not made to carry out existing law, a general direction which had no definition, no point, no certainty to it; and of course the House did not intend to commit to the committee the final decision of what items in the bill were in conformity with existing laws and what were not. But even in that case, the bill having been again reported to the House of Representatives in its full capacity with the Speaker in the chair, the point of order was made that the House could not change the action of that committee in striking out what they had done pursuant to that direction. The Speaker overruled the point of order as he ought to have overruled it. An appeal was taken, and it was only laid on the table by a vote of 86 to 75, although the Speaker was clearly right.

The point is, as you will find and as everybody will find who will take the trouble to study before he decides, that where a parliamentary body wishes to do a particular thing in a particular form, it has the same right to do it by a committee of one (as is done in the Legislature of the State of Vermont) as it has to do it by the secretary at the desk and when in pursuance of this command it has been done, it is done. But, however, I pass that now and I come back to the question that is before the Senate.

The Senator from South Carolina has moved to amend the motion of the Senator from Minnesota by striking out I believe all after the word "instructions." Will the Secretary kindly read where the amendment begins?

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "instructions," in the second line.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina by striking it all out and inserting what I send to the desk, and after it is read I will state what my purpose is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

To keep the total appropriations within the aggregate sum appropriated by the bill of the House, and that the items be adjusted accordingly in such manner as best to promote the public interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will bring us face to face with two propositions. I shall vote in the end for the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota; but as between the proposition of putting $10,000,000 into the hands of the President of the United States and keeping this bill within reasonable bounds set by the Senate, to be fixed by the committee, I should prefer what I have stated; and when the proper time comes I shall ask the yeas and nays on this amendment to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. KENNA and others. Let the last amendment be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to the amendment of Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. KENNA. It seems to me that every Senator must realize at once that the adoption of that amendment means no river and harbor bill at this session. I do no injustice to any Senator on this floor or to any number of Senators when I say that it is beyond the limits of possibility that a general revision and readjustment of this bill can be made by any committee prior to the time at which in all probability this Congress will adjourn. It involves a revision of every item in this bill and a readjustment of it, and the attempt to accomplish such a task will simply prevent the passage of the bill during this session of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But this amendment now involves the proposition whether you would rather do that or put $10,000,000 into the hands of the President of the United States in a lump.

Mr. KENNA. I think not. I think this bill stands here as reported by the committee of the Senate and as amended by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and that proposition is before the Senate. There are various alternatives in the construction of the bill, as the Senator from Vermont will find before we get through with it.

Mr. MILLER. It seems to me that the proper thing to do now is for the chairman of the committee—and I make the suggestion—to withdraw his resolution until such time as we shall have considered in the Senate the amendments which were made as in Committee of the Whole, allowing each Senator to call for a vote upon any amendment which he desires to have a separate vote upon. It is very evident that we can not do otherwise.

I have no doubt the decision of the Senate on the point of order raised, if submitted to it, would be that even if the instructions contained in this resolution were carried out and the bill was reported back to the Senate, in accordance with the resolution, the Senate would hold that it was proper and parliamentary for amendments to be offered to the bill, according to the rules of the Senate of course, and a vote could be had afterward on every amendment. Certainly it would not do to send this bill back to the committee and reduce it 30 per cent., and then when it was reported back to have some items put up or put down by amendments as they might be by a vote of the Senate, and then, of course, the justice of the horizontal reduction would be entirely destroyed. It seems to me, therefore, that it is better under the circumstances of this discussion that the resolution should be withdrawn and that we should proceed to vote.

Before that is done I desire to say a few words in regard to my own position on this question of a reduction of 30 per cent. The Senator from Illinois has sharply criticised the members of the committee for their pusillanimous course in consenting to such a reduction. Of course I need not repeat to the Senate to-day that I have always stood for liberal appropriations, I may say for large appropriations for internal improvements, and I have not changed my position. But after consulting with nearly all the members of the committee and with a large number of my colleagues upon this floor, I have become convinced that a majority of this body would favor such a reduction, that it was sure to carry; and I am one of those who believe that the wisdom of the majority is usually greater than the wisdom of the minority. Although I hold to my own opinion that the bill is not too large, yet as a member of the committee I freely consented to this reduction.

After the bill shall have been voted upon in the Senate and amended as the Senate shall desire to have it amended, then I hope the chairman of the committee will renew his resolution, modified as it will then be necessary to modify it, making this reduction. In my judgment that proposition will receive the support of a majority of the members of the Senate. I have consented to this. I have consented to waive my own ideas and my own opinions because of the great necessity of the public works, believing that, if this is not done, even this bill perhaps may not pass the Senate at all and certainly that it can not become a law unless some such concession as this is made.

I do not admit at all that the amount in the present bill is too large as the Senator from Vermont stated it to be; neither do I admit for a moment that the appropriations are too much diversified and divided; that is, that they are given to too large a number of objects. I do not know of any rule by which the people living around New York Harbor or living upon the Mississippi River or at San Francisco are any more entitled to the fostering care of the Federal Government than the man who lives upon a little bay out of the Chesapeake Bay or who lives upon any little navigable stream of the South. I believe that the fostering care of this Government must extend to all our people.

Neither do I admit, as has been stated here to-day, that there are appropriations in this bill which are not justifiable by the wants of commerce. I have stated before that there are appropriations in it for works which I believe might well afford to wait to a later time for improvement. There are measures in it which I should have been glad to see taken out, but I do not admit at all that the Committee on Commerce in making up this bill have by a majority of their votes consented to the putting into it of any swindles or any steals, as they understand it and know it; and I judge that the Committee on Commerce, having considered this measure for nearly two months, have some idea at least, and perhaps as good as those who have not studied it more than a day or two, of the items which are contained in the bill.

Having stated this and my position upon it and my reasons for my present consent to a reduction of the bill, I hope the chairman of the committee will withdraw the resolution for the present and let us proceed to vote upon the amendments seriatim.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, I submitted this motion wholly with the purpose of economizing time, but it has evidently not tended in that direction. It is evident that the Senate desires to vote upon each of the items of amendment of this bill in the Senate. I do not feel disposed to prevent them from expressing their convictions upon every item in the bill. I think therefore it will tend to facilitate the passage of the bill if I withdraw the motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws the motion made by him. The question recurs on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Does the Senator from Kansas ask for a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas ask for a separate vote on each amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not ask for a vote on each amendment; but it is absolutely necessary, as the bill has not been reprinted and we do not know what is in the bill or out of it, that these amendments should be read seriatim. I shall not ask a vote upon any except such as I wish to dispute. They can be read over and agreed to without objection unless opposition is made, so far as I am concerned, as they are read, unless I wish to call attention to some particular amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will all be read; and if there is no objection, the Chair will understand that each amendment as read is concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It must be announced from the Chair in each case so that we can know where we are.

Mr. INGALLS. Beginning, of course, with the beginning of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly. The amendments will be read in their order.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer the amendment I suggested this morning. I do not ask a vote on it now; but when we come to the proposition in reference to the Illinois River I propose to offer an amendment to increase it $50,000.

Mr. MILLER. I suggest that the Secretary proceed to read the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and at any point if any Senator desires to offer an amendment he can offer it at the time, so that we go over the bill but once.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read in their order.

The first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, after line 15, to insert:

Improving the channel in Back Cove, Portland, Me.: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, to strike out the following clause from line 127 to line 133:

Improving harbor of New York at Gedney's Channel, New York: Continuing improvement, $150,000; of which sum $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used by the Chief of Engineers and the Coast and Geodetic Survey to ascertain the best outlet to the ocean: Provided, That in the judgment of the War Department such survey is necessary.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Improving New York Harbor, New York: Continuing improvement to secure a 30-foot channel at mean low water at the Sandy Hook entrance of the harbor, upon such plan as the Secretary of War may approve, $1,000,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 143, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Raritan Bay, New Jersey: Continuing improvement," from $30,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 143, to inset:

Improving harbor at Plattsburg, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 145, to insert:

For a more thorough and definite survey and examination of the harbor at Atlantic City, N. J., with a view to making a harbor of refuge at that point, $5,000; said examination and survey to be made by a board consisting of three United States engineers.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 165, to strike out the word "channel" and insert "ice-harbor;" so as to read:

Improving ice-harbor at Marcus Hook, Pa.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 170, after the word "ice-harbor," to strike out "if in his opinion said piers be useless to the Government and their present condition be dangerous to navigation;" so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of War is authorized to cede to the city of Chester, Pa., the upper and lower piers located in said city and extending into the Delaware River, and formerly used as an ice-harbor.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 180, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Baltimore, Md.: Continuing improvement," from $100,000 to $200,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 182, to insert:

For continuing the improvement of the Potomac River in the vicinity of Washington, with reference to the improvement in navigation, the establishment of harbor-lines, and the raising of the flats under the direction of the Secretary of War and in accordance with existing plans, $500,000: Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended upon or with reference to any place in respect of which the title of the United States is in doubt, or in respect to which any claim adverse to the United States has been made.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, to strike out from line 193 to 199, inclusive, as follows:

Improving harbor at Norfolk, Va.: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Improving approach to Norfolk Harbor and the United States navy-yard at Norfolk, Va.: Continuing improvement by widening the channel of Elizabeth River to the port warden's line on the eastern side, between Lambert's Point Light and Fort Norfolk, $50,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Improving harbor at Norfolk, Va., and improving approach to Norfolk Harbor and the United States navy-yard at Norfolk: Continuing improvement by widening the channel of Elizabeth River to the port warden's line on the eastern side, between Lambert's Point Light and Fort Norfolk, $250,000; of which $100,000 shall be expended in improving the harbor, and $150,000 in widening the channel of Elizabeth River to the port warden's line on the eastern side, between Lambert's Point Light and Fort Norfolk, beginning at Lambert's Point Light, including the construction of the proposed dike.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 220, to insert:

Improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 228, to reduce the appropriation for "improving Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida: Continuing improvement" from $150,000 to $100,000.

Mr. CALL. I object to that. I hope the Senate will not concur in that amendment. That is the amendment relating to Cumberland Sound and Amelia Island in Florida. The House fixed the appropriation at $150,000. The subject was very fully discussed the other day, and I think it unnecessary to trouble the Senate with a repetition of the arguments then made in reference to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. This is a very great reduction. Florida is almost the only State in which the appropriations made by the House have been cut down. Senators on the other side have increased almost every item, and increased even the little rivers in the country, which I do not object to. I think there is a great deal of erroneous criticism on this subject. But I will not go into that argument.

This has the recommendation of the engineers. There is a fortification there, and a large amount of money has been expended. The engineers have certified that this amount is absolutely necessary to the preservation of the work, and by neglecting it the money already expended will be lost. Why it is, after the Senate has increased nearly every other appropriation in the bill, that this State alone should be cut down by the Senate I do not understand.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Florida. This matter was fully discussed before, and I am not going into any discussion of it now; but I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he give his consent that this item may be entirely stricken out, and that the $150,000 appropriated in it be added to the improvement of the mouth of the Saint John's River. Let us finish up one great work in that State before we commence another. This work at Cumberland Sound is going to cost two or three million dollars, and will not be finished till the next ten or twenty years, whereas the Saint John's River drains nearly the whole of Florida and carries the bulk of its commerce.

Mr. CALL. I should not feel justified, as the United States has undertaken the work and expended $230,000 upon it, to consent to that money being thrown away.

The engineers have certified that the continuance of the work here is necessary to the preservation of that which has been done; and although I live at Jacksonville and would greatly prefer that the entrance to the Saint John's River above all other places on the Atlantic coast should be made a deep-water harbor and receive an adequate appropriation, I do not think it right that I should consent that the adjacent city of Fernandina and the adjacacent ports in the State of Georgia, all of which are interested, and still more than that that the commerce of the United States amounting to millions of dollars that passes within sight of that port and finds a refuge there in case of storm should be deprived of the advantage of that port as a harbor and place of refuge.

The expenditure of this money and a little more than this in the course of a year or two will make the harbor of Fernandina one of the best in the world. That is a matter beyond all doubt. The work has been commenced, established by the Government, and with $150,000 appropriated for it I do not think it would be right for me to consent or that it would be good policy in the Government to throw away the money that has already been expended there. I trust therefore that the Senate will not agree to reduce this amount.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This question was very fully discussed in committee, and I shall leave it there. It is not necessary to say anything further.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Several Senators (to Mr. CALL). Give it up.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I understand the Senator from Florida to withdraw his request for any further action?

Mr. CALL. I do not understand that the amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. It was not so announced by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that the result of the division was 15 in the affirmative and 18 in the negative.

Mr. MILLER. Let us have the yeas and nays then.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should be glad to hear the amendment reported, as I was necessarily absent for a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 228 after the word "hundred" strike out "and fifty;" so as to read:

Improving Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand a vote of "nay" raises this appropriation to $150,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the effect.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] requested me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. He is paired with me generally, but he is paired with the Senator from Kansas on this question.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON] in his absence. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired on the final vote on the bill with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], but I reserved the right to vote as my judgment dictated upon improvements of this kind, and I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Blair,	Frye,	McMillan,	Platt,
Conger,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Sherman,

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in line 231 of section 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Savannah, Ga.: Continuing improvement, $175,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, after line 234 of section 1, to add "of which $2,000 may be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, at the Carabello or Crooked River."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Massachusetts requested everybody wherever he saw a head to hit it, as the Irishman said. I can not take up the time of the Senate in doing that, but I should really be glad to have this matter explained a little as a mere sample of these things.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This is an amendment that was inserted in line 234 by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the effect?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The appropriation in the bill is for Apalachicola Bay. The amendment is "of which $2,000 may be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, at Carabello or Crooked River."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me see if I can find Crooked River in the engineer's report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In Apalachicola Bay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Crooked River can not be in Apalachicola Bay.

Mr. CALL. There is no Senate amendment at Apalachicola Bay.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole made the amendment which has been read.

Mr. CALL. I should like to have it read again.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator ought to know it. If there is no amendment there must be a mistake in the work of the Secretary.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it be stricken out then.
Mr. CALL. What is the amendment?
Mr. MILLER. Let it be again read.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read again.
The Chief Clerk read the amendment.
Mr. CALL. That was adopted by the Committee of the Whole.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is Crooked River?
Mr. CALL. In the report of 1884 you will find the estimate of the engineers and the report of the examination of Crooked or Carabello River. Carabello River empties into Apalachicola Bay near what is called Dog Island, which is the deep-sea entrance for the foreign ships that carry lumber from Apalachicola to Europe, in which there is quite a large trade.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand that there is any estimate for it this year.
Mr. CALL. There is no estimate for it this year. There was an estimate for it two years ago.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, to shorten time, I make the point of order.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is too late.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Not too late in this body. This is a report from the Committee of the Whole, if the Chair please. This item in the report of the Committee of the Whole is now up for the first time in the Senate.
Mr. CALL. I know it is very difficult to appeal to the Senator from Vermont; but I should like very much, if he would allow me to ask a question, to know what object he has in objecting if the Secretary of War in his discretion on consulting the Chief of Engineers shall find under the recommendation of 1884, with the estimates and reports there made, that it is advisable for the commerce of Apalachicola Bay that $2,000 of this money shall be expended at the anchorage where the large ships lie? I should like to know what possible interest there is in rising to a point of order upon that. It does not increase the appropriation except it provides that the Secretary of War shall in his discretion, if he finds it necessary——
Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Florida allow me?
Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad as a matter of curiosity to know who has the floor just now?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order does not lie against the action of the Senate in Committee of the Whole. The Chair is advised by the Chief Clerk that that has been the ruling frequently.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I give up the point of order; but I ask who has the floor?
The PRESIDNT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator from Florida. I should like that point to be looked at, but I will not insist upon it now, though it may be important hereafter. I should be glad to hear what the Senator from Florida desires to say.
Mr. CALL. I was saying that I can not see what possible ground of objection there could be. It is not compulsory on the Secretary of War, it is simply permissive. It allows him to use $2,000 of this money, if he shall find it advisable to do so, at another part of the same harbor, namely, the deep-sea entrance, where the large ships lie, at Carabello River. That is all I have to say, and I submit the matter to the Senate.
Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not increase the sum of twelve or fifteen thousand dollars that is appropriated, but the amendment is either entirely useless and a mere repetition of what the bill contains, or it takes from the appropriation for Apalachicola Bay $3,000 and devotes it to something else. If the thing to be done is to improve the anchorage of ships in Apalachicola Bay the item in the bill as it stands is ample for that purpose. If the money is to be carried out of that bay and into a river for which there is no estimate and in respect of which we have no information, then I say without regard to the point of order that it is wrong.
If my friend from Florida would kindly furnish us with the report of 1884 as to what the engineers say about Crooked River, we might have further light on the subject. Has the Senator the report of 1884 at his desk?
Mr. CALL. I have not. I will ask that the item be passed, and I will secure the report.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that. I do not know but that I am strongly for Crooked River; and if so, it is the only crooked thing I am for, as far as I know.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection this item will be passed over for the present. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be read.
The CHIEF CLERK. In line 272 of section 1, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole struck out the words "twenty-five" before thousand" and inserted "forty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Ashtabula, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $40,000.

The amendment was concurred in.
The next amendment was, in line 282 of section 1, before the word "five," to insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Fairport, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know what that means. Is it for the purpose of acquiring title to land?
Mr. McMILLAN. This is in line 282, Fairport, Ohio.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report of the engineers.
Mr. MILLER. I can state the matter. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has the papers, but I think I can state the case to the satisfaction of the Senator from Vermont.
This amount was increased from $5,000 to $25,000 by a vote in Committee of the Whole upon an amendment offered by the Committee on Commerce, through the Senator from Maine, who was instructed to offer the amendment after the bill had been reported to the Senate. The engineer's report calls for this expenditure of $25,000 or more. It so happens that the harbor has a bar at the mouth of it and that several railroads terminating there have been just completed, or are about completed, and the harbor is used for the sending out of coal to the lakes and the bringing in of vast quantities of iron ore from the upper lakes which are to be carried to the furnaces on the line of those roads; and unless an appropriation is made sufficiently large to clear out this channel at once—the engineer reports that it can be done for $25,000 within a very short time—of course none of this business can be set in motion. It was for that reason that the committee decided to recommend this increase to $25,000, this information having come to the committee by subsequent reports from one of the engineers after the bill had been reported to the Senate.
Mr. EDMUNDS. How far east of Cleveland is Fairport?
Mr. MILLER. Not very far. I am not sure as to the exact distance.
Mr. McMILLAN. About 40 miles.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I rather incline to think that this increase of the appropriation is necessary if you are going to open Fairport River, for the engineer this year says:

The project of improvement adopted in 1825, when the mouth of the river was closed by a sand-bar so hard and dry in summer that teams could drive across—

And the project has been amended, not the river—and which project has been amended from time to time since that date, as the demands of commerce called for an increased depth of water—

As I should think it would over a sand-bar so dry that you could drive a wagon across—provides for parallel piers 200 feet apart, running out from each side of the entrance to a depth of 16 feet in the lake.

OPERATIONS DURING THE FISCAL YEAR.

Balance on hand at beginning of fiscal year was only $425.08. No work was in progress. The act of July 5, 1884, appropriated $10,000 for this harbor, which it was decided to expend in extension of the east pier in dredging and in repairs to piers.
A contract was made—

Then it states the proposals and that they made a contract with Mr. Rooney, of Ohio—to excavate about 10,000 cubic yards, at 23¾ cents per cubic yard. Dredge operations were commenced May 25, and completed June 25, 1885; a total of 10,082 cubic yards were removed from channel at end of piers, and from the bars in lake beyond end of piers, and resulted in restoring a good 16-foot channel between piers, and a good 15½-foot channel through bars in lake at entrance to harbor.

Work, under contract with Courtland D. Merry, was not begun until April 9, 1885, although the contractor was advised to begin the construction of his cribs much earlier. The work has made very poor progress, and by June 20, 1885, the date mentioned for completion of the contract, not one-third had been accomplished. An extension until July 31, 1885, was asked for and obtained, the favor being granted, not as deserved, but because no serious disadvantage had been occasioned by the delay.

From which I should suppose that there was not a vast amount of commerce that was struggling to get in and out when a delay of that time made no disadvantage.

The present project provides for an extension of both piers, for repairs and for dredging, so as to obtain and maintain a good channel 16 feet deep and 200 feet wide from the lake to railroad docks near mouth of river. The estimated cost is $93,000, of which sum $43,000 have been appropriated and $30,000 can be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

* * * * * *

Fairport Harbor is in the collection district of Cuyahoga, Ohio.

That is the Cleveland district, I believe.

There is a fixed white light of the third order on shore and a beacon on the east pier.
The value of the imports for the season of 1884 was $192,532.
The collector failed to estimate the value of the exports—

I do not know whether that means in the collection district or in the port. I am not sure but that this was this very port itself. If so it is a very considerable port.
Mr. FRYE. It was this port.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I go on:

Forty vessels (engaged in the coasting trade), with an aggregate tonnage of 16,014 tons, entered, and twenty-five vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of 12,209 tons, cleared during season of 1884.

That leaves fifteen in. They can not get out, I suppose. Now if my friend from Maine will come in and really tell us a little about this, as the engineers' reports are sometimes a little misleading, I would like to hear him.
Mr. FRYE. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Vermont entirely. The harbor is very good indeed. It was the terminus of the narrow-gauge railroad which ran down I do not know how far—I have ridden on it—toward Western Pennsylvania from Fairport to Youngstown, and that narrow-gauge railroad was used almost entirely for the transportation of coal and iron from the Superior country, but the capacity of the railroad, being a narrow-gauge railroad, was of course not large. My recollection is—I have had the papers—that last year 100,000 tons of that iron were carried down over that railroad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Down to where?

Mr. FRYE. Down to Youngstown; and since that time and since any report of the engineer which we have here has been made, and since the House committee passed upon this item, and since the Committee on Commerce of the Senate passed upon the item as it originally appeared in the bill, information has been received of the formation of a transportation company in Western Pennsylvania, headed by the Olivers, with a large capital, and a combination between them and the intermediate railroads and the leasing of this narrow-gauge railroad, and the broadening of the gauge, and the expenditure of $200,000 in docks and piers, and the certainty of transportation over that road, instead of 100,000 tons, of over 600,000 tons this year and, as they clearly show, a million tons next year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the Painesville and Youngstown Railroad?

Mr. FRYE. Yes. A communication was made to the War Department of these facts, up to that time unknown to them, and they sent a reply, in which they stated that owing to this great increase of business there was no doubt it was very important that this harbor should be improved to the extent that it was necessary to be improved at once in order to enable this road to do the business and enable this amount of iron to be transported. The whole amount which they estimated as necessary for the completion of the improvement was $30,000, so that there will be 16 feet of water and the vessels used could readily pass in and out. We recommended the appropriation of $25,000 of the $30,000. I do not think myself that there is a shadow of a doubt about the propriety of this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where does the iron that is to go down to Youngstown come from?

Mr. FRYE. Lake Superior.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much farther is it from Cleveland to Youngstown by the shortest railroad line than it is from Fairport?

Mr. PAYNE. It is about 60 miles by either road.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Ohio says the distance is about the same from Cleveland; but the distance from Lake Superior by the steamship route to Cleveland I suppose is 50 miles less than it is to Fairport.

Mr. PAYNE. There is nearly 30 miles between them on the lake.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that Cleveland, being an open port and provided for, can take this iron and carry it over a railroad the same distance to Youngstown, and save the vessels from going 30 miles farther to carry it to Fairport to go down to Youngstown.

Mr. FRYE. But there has been a railroad for a large number of years, twenty years, right at this same port of Fairport, and it has done all that it was capable of doing at that port, being a narrow-gauge road. Now, I say it is to be a broad-gauge road, a fact unknown to the Department until a fortnight ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you the letters?

Mr. FRYE. I returned them this morning to Mr. Oliver, who applied to the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have the Department on record.

Mr. FRYE. I stated yesterday when this matter came up that I had a letter from the Department recommending this appropriation, but I did not read the letter, because no one made any objection to the amendment and I never waste any time when I get what I am after. The propriety of the amendment is beyond any manner of question.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, before the word "thousand," in line 286 of section 1, to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

Improving ice-harbor at the mouth of the Muskingum River, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a new amendment, and I should be glad to have it explained. It does not appear in the printed copy of the bill I have.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that Colonel Merrill, the engineer in charge of that improvement, says that unless this amount is appropriated it would not be worth while to appropriate any amount. The House inserted $30,000 here, and it is on the recommendation of Colonel Merrill, the engineer in charge of the improvement, that we have increased it to $50,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the recommendation? I see on page 1821, part 3:

To complete the project will require an expenditure of $96,000, as shown in detail in the accompanying report of Mr. William Weston, the resident engineer, to which reference is made.

There have been expended on this work $199,145.37, and as $96,000 more is required, of which $836.63 is on hand, there is yet $95,163.37 to be appropriated. The total cost of the work will therefore be, in round numbers, $296,000.

The estimated cost of this work, as given in my annual report for 1880, is $216,400. The increased cost over the estimate is, therefore, $79,600, or 37 per cent.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me to read an extract from the report of Colonel Merrill, the engineer in charge of the improvement, it will perhaps save some time.

After this item was inserted in the House bill a communication from Colonel Merrill, transmitted by the acting Chief of Engineers, was transmitted to the Secretary of War and by him transmitted to us, in which Colonel Merrill says:

I have the honor to state that I have just received a copy of the new river and harbor bill (H. R. 7480), and I think it my duty to call attention to a number of items which deserve consideration, namely:

Line 231, "Improving ice-harbor at the mouth of the Muskingum River, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $30,000."

Nothing can be done with so small a sum. Unless it can be raised to a minimum of $55,000 the item might as well be omitted. I have written to General WARNER, member of Congress from Marietta, fully explaining this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is an ice-harbor, if I may inquire?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is for the protection of boats in the winter. It is at the mouth of the Muskingum River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is when the lake is frozen up to keep the boats from being crushed by the expansion of the ice?

Mr. McMILLAN. Not that altogether.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it then?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is to prevent them from being injured by the ice in the harbor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the shores of Lake Erie, as on the shores of all the Northern lakes in winter, the ice extends solid generally out a considerable distance.

Mr. McMILLAN. This is on the Ohio River, at the mouth of the Muskingum River, at Marietta.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not on the lakes?

Mr. McMILLAN. No; on the Ohio River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a different thing. Then it is the flood-ice that comes down?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the point of this improvement is to preserve vessels in the winter against the crush of ice that comes along down, the protection of this property at a time when the boats can not sail. I think I understand it now.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, after line 289, to insert:

For the purpose of acquiring the title to the land adjoining the inner end of the west pier built by the United States for the improvement of the harbor at Port Clinton, Ohio, the Secretary of War shall negotiate with the owner or owners of the land for the purchase thereof at a reasonable price, to be approved by Congress; and if an agreement as to price can not be made with the owner, then the value of the same shall be ascertained in the mode provided by the laws of Ohio for the condemnation of lands for public uses in that State, the result of said proceedings of condemnation, if taken, to be reported to the next Congress for its approval.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that explained. Let the chairman of the committee tell us what there is about that.

Mr. CONGER. That was all explained when the bill was gone over, but unfortunately I think the Senator was not present. This is to purchase a little point at Port Clinton Harbor, which the Government has made at considerable expense, and it is necessary to carry out the piers and the embankments into the channel of the river. This indicates the mode of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what that little piece of land will cost, and then it is open to Congress to make the appropriation for it or not, as Congress may think proper. The whole thing has been discussed here, but I do not know that the Senator was present at the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But we were told that the committee was one thing and the Senate was another, and if everybody did not make inquiry at every time he would be considered to have thought that every item reported from the Committee of the Whole was a good one. I want to go far enough to show that I do not mean to be foreclosed in that way.

Mr. CONGER. There is no reason for not supposing that the recommendation is a good one. I might say that the improvement at the mouth of this river was commenced at the expense of the Quaker settlement there some years ago, and they expended a good deal of money to improve the entrance to the Portage River. The old Quakers came down here some years ago and got a little appropriation to make that river navigable. Any one passing by the lake shore going to Toledo passes right along by this river, and who sees there the mills and factories that have grown up by this little settlement and the vessels that go up this river would agree to this. It is just off the lake, in sight of the lake, beyond Sandusky Bay. Congress has given them small appropriations to assist in making their harbor a harbor of entrance for the kind of vessels which carry off their grain and staves and lumber and all the productions of the colony.

Now, we find that it is necessary to have a little point of land which the Government can control before they put on additional works necessary to protect the harbor. This item does not make any appropriation, but is to ascertain what the cost of the land will be. The people there very much desire it, and from my knowledge of the place now and in former years I think it is a very proper request.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not find in the report of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, so far as I have been able to read it hastily, any statement or request concerning the purchase or otherwise obtaining of any land. They seem to be more troubled at that place for water than for land, for some reason or other. There is not, that I can see at pages 2215 and 2216 of the report of this year, any suggestion or estimate for buying or condemning any land or any reference to the necessity of obtaining any land for any purpose whatever; but it may be that there is some special report. Then I find in the encyclopædic summary the condition of things at that place which is worth reading:

Port Clinton is a port of entry in the collection district of Sandusky, Ohio. The nearest work of defense is Fort Wayne, 60 miles distant—

If it was proposed to build a fort there, as they are 60 miles away from a fort, I could immediately see the logic of it—and the nearest light-house is at Green Island, 10 miles distant.

The amount of commerce to be benefited by this improvement is small. For miles above the mouth of Portage River, and bordering upon its banks, are extensive tracts of hard-wood timber, from which lumber, staves, spokes, &c., are made and sent to Port Clinton for shipment.

The amount of revenue collected during eleven months ending May 31, 1885, was $15.25.

There were no imports or exports.

Twenty-six vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of 2,150 tons, entered, and twenty-one vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of 1,898 tons, cleared—

Leaving five vessels in port—during eleven months ending May 31, 1885.

The deputy collector of the port states "that a very small part of vessels that trade from this port do not enter or clear, for they do not trade out of the district."

Then he gives the money statement, of the sums on hand, and the "amount (estimated) required for completion the existing project"—you will observe that is a project and not an improvement—"$44,000."

I merely state it to show that I think this is one of the instances as compared with Cleveland and the last one we had where a railroad goes that illustrates the variety of small local objects which are very nice for the neighbors but have nothing to do with the general interests of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. The engineer recommends this urgently.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in line 308 of section 1, after the words "Maumee River," to strike out "or Straight Channel" and insert "by a straight channel along such line as may be approved by the Secretary of War;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Toledo, Ohio: Continuing improvement of the Maumee River by a straight channel along such line as may be approved by the Secretary of War, $150,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 311, after the words "and the," to insert "balance of the;" so as to read:

And the balance of the $25,000 heretofore appropriated are hereby made available for clearing the old channel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to inquire—I have not the slightest objection to this amendment and I do not know anything about it—in view of what has been said, and I suppose truly, as the nature of these river and harbor bills that the appropriations never run out with the year or two years, why is it necessary to reappropriate this old balance for the purpose of continuing the improvement of that harbor? I merely ask for information.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Because there is a slight change in the project as it originally existed in that which has been now adopted by the Engineer Department, and this change of language is merely to enable the Engineer Department to make the improvement to the most advantage. It is done upon a special recommendation from the engineer in charge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not on the merit of it. I only wanted to know what was the state of the law that made it necessary to reappropriate money for that object.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Because it requires a little different use of money——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Than the former appropriation provides. Very well.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in section 1, line 317, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Michigan City, Ind.: Continuing improvement, $75,000; of which sum $2,500 are to be used on the inner harbor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear that explained. Perhaps it was explained before, but I should like to hear it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will find all that in the report of the Chief of Engineers, page 2088, in the appendix, and 322 in the first volume.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Vermont need not spend any time about that amendment. Michigan City is the only lake harbor of Indiana, and it is a very important one. The Government has been for some years engaged in making a harbor there. It has a large commerce, especially of lumber from the upper lakes. It is the point at which very large lake commerce enters the State. The appropriation is very much less than the estimates.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are there railroads from Michigan City?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; there are railroads passing through Michigan City, going east and north and south of Michigan City. It is the only lake port in the State of Indiana. It touches Lake Michigan simply at its lower extremity, and it is a very important port.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amount estimated, "required for the completion of the existing project, $450,000," and this calls for only $75,000. That is moderate. I see that this place appears to have really a decidedly large commerce. There were thirteen hundred and thirty-four vessels entered and cleared, which would make nearly seven hundred in and seven hundred out in the course of the fiscal year. That leads me to the conclusion that this is probably one of the places fairly entitled to be considered.

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 344, after the word "Michigan," to strike out "continuing improvement" and insert "by repairs;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Monroe, Mich.: By repairs $2,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in line 408 of section 1, to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Ashland, Wis.: Continuing improvement $30,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, after line 408, to insert:

For making free of toll to commerce the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-canal connecting the waters of Green Bay with Lake Michigan in the State of Wisconsin, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall have caused an examination to be made by a board of three United States engineers into the importance and value to commerce and navigation of the free use of said ship-canal, and until the report of said board shall be in favor of making said canal free to commerce: And provided further, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall be satisfied, upon investigation, as to the actual cost of said canal to said company, and then only so much of said sum shall be expended as the said Secretary of War shall be satisfied is necessary to reimburse the said company for advances and expenses actually made and incurred in constructing said canal and in maintaining the same over and above the net proceeds of the lands granted by Congress to aid in constructing said canal and over and above the tolls received therefrom, with interest, as provided by the act of Congress making said grant, approved April 10, 1866. And none of said moneys shall be expended except upon a full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said ship-canal, harbor, easements, rights of way, piers, docks, and appurtenances of every name and nature pertaining to said work.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend that amendment where it says "conveyance," by inserting "free and clear of all lien or incumbrance."

While that is being written, I will say that this matter was discussed in the Committee of the Whole and a very decided majority, as I remember, was in favor of it against my vote, and it is no use for me to take time in discussing it any more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 428, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert:

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 450, to strike out the following clause:

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, That no part of such sum shall be expended until the 12 acres of land necessary to said improvement shall have been conveyed to the United States free of expense, and such conveyance has been approved by the Secretary of War, after the Attorney-General of the United States shall have certified to the Secretary of War that the title is perfect.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor and bay at Humboldt, Cal.: Continuing improvement, $100,000: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the 12 acres of land necessary to said improvement shall have been conveyed to the United States free of expense, and such conveyance has been approved by the Secretary of War, after the Attorney-General of the United States shall have certified to the Secretary of War that the title is perfect.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I would call the attention of the Secretary of the Senate to the amendment in line 460, at the end of the line. I want to get the precise words of that amendment. I do not know that I have them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was amended in committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I want to see if I have the exact language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator want to recur to the amendment?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is the amendment at the end of line 460 to insert:

After the Attorney-General of the United States shall have certified to the Secretary of War that the title is perfect?

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in line 976 of section 1, after the word "works," to insert the words "and property;" and, in line 978, to strike out the words "the works" at the end of the line; so as to read:

The works and property of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company, situated on the Green and Barren Rivers, in the State of Kentucky, and of the Monongahela Navigation Company, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, before you go on with this clause, which somehow or other is contrary to geography (the Barren River, of Kentucky I believe it is, the Green River and the Monongahela River in Pennsylvania are brought into a junction that nature never gave to them), I should like to have what is contemplated by this provision explained. What are these works, and why are we to go into the matter? What do they do and how are they brought together?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. To my understanding the bill clearly states the case here. It speaks of the rivers Green and Barren. I think that is quite a sufficient answer to any suggestion which may be made, and the committee have taken the great caution to strike out the words "negotiate for the purchase" and to insert "ascertain the value and commercial importance of the works and property," not the rivers but the property, not to help a State by improving a river or a harbor, as the bill by its title would imply, but to ascertain the value of the works of the Green and Barren River corporation. That is what it means and what it says.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The chairman of the committee does not inform us about the Barren River and Green River and the Monongahela. What is the general purpose of this provision? How are these works situated? What are they now, and what have they to do with the commerce of the country?

Mr. McMILLAN. This provision was inserted by the House of Representatives and came to the Senate in the bill. The Senate Committee on Commerce modified the provision and left it in what we regarded as the most favorable position for the Government of the United States if it was to be inserted in the bill at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true. The committee has done good work as far as it has gone.

Mr. McMILLAN. We did not feel at liberty to strike it out of the bill. The object of the provision is merely to ascertain the value and commercial importance of the works and property of these navigation companies. With the Monongahela Navigation Company I am somewhat familiar. It is a corporation under the laws of Pennsylvania, which has constructed slack-water upon the Monongahela River, extending from Pittsburgh up the river to near Monongahela City. A system of locks and dams has been constructed by that company who have had charge of the improvement for very many years. This slack waters the Monongahela River for that distance.

The Government of the United States has erected a dam and lock above the works of the Monongahela Navigation Company. The company is in a very prosperous condition and is very much opposed to the Government taking its property, and appeared before the committee to protest against it. Other interests in that locality very urgently pressed upon the committee the retention of this provision in the bill, and we thought that an examination by the engineers would perhaps do no harm, and it would leave the Government without any obligation to proceed any further in the purchase of the property.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it the theory of the committee that everything is to be put in the bill that will not do any harm?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir, it is not; but the committee——

Mr. INGALLS. Then I wish the Senator would state to us what is the good it can do.

Mr. McMILLAN. The committee were of opinion that public interests were involved here which should be determined by Congress after full information obtained.

Mr. INGALLS. What information have the committee as to the amount which has been expended here and the estimated value of the works and the probable expenditure that this might involve us in? I am unable to find anything in the report of the committee bearing on the subject.

Mr. McMILLAN. The object of the provision is to ascertain what is the value and condition of these works.

Mr. INGALLS. No; that is stricken out. The committee have amended it so as to eliminate that provision to ascertain the value of such works.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; "the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the value and commercial importance of the works and property of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company."

Mr. INGALLS. In line 981 the words are stricken out, but I see they have been inserted in the first part of the paragraph. I think before we are called upon to vote upon this matter the chairman ought certainly to give us some information as to the probable amount that is involved here, because although there is a proviso at the close of the paragraph saying that nothing herein shall be construed as committing Congress to the said work, we all know what that means.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator does know what that means, the committee intended to give it very full effect. If a proposition were made to the committee to purchase the works now, I am inclined to think that no member of the committee would consent to entertain the proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. Why?

Mr. McMILLAN. Because the works are of too great value, they subserve the public interest to too great an extent now to authorize the Government to purchase them at the price they would cost.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, they are of so much importance that the Government ought not to interfere with them?

Mr. McMILLAN. They are of great public importance.

Mr. INGALLS. I thought the theory on which the appropriations were made was that where there were works of great public importance the Government ought to take charge of them.

Mr. McMILLAN. The company are keeping the Monongahela River in such a condition that it answers the purposes of navigation, and the cost upon commerce, the tolls, are very low. I shall only express my own opinion in regard to that. I think the burden on commerce there is not such as would justify the Government at this time in entering into that great expense.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the estimated value of the works, if the Senator will permit me?

Mr. McMILLAN. Of course we have a mere private estimate. The works have never been under the jurisdiction of the Government, nor has any survey or examination been made by the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The company say they are worth $400,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the estimate of the company, $4,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. McMILLAN. Not of the Monongahela Navigation Company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, you were speaking of the Monongahela company. I was speaking of the Barren River corporation. I beg pardon.

Mr. McMILLAN. They estimate the property altogether, I think, at between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000—at $4,000,000 perhaps.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator state the amount of revenue that they derive from tolls on commerce?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; I can not, because there is no official information given on that point.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is it not the effect of this provision to acquire the property of the company?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; this provision is merely for the purpose of ascertaining the value of these works in answer to a demand made by a very heavy commercial interest asking for the purchase of these improvements.

Mr. INGALLS. What interest is that?

Mr. McMILLAN. The principal interest perhaps is the coal interest.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator to say that the tolls were so low that there was no burden upon navigation.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; I did not say that. I said the tolls were very light in proportion to the expense of the improvement. The river, it is claimed, is in such a condition that it brings the coal interests of the Monongahela in competition with the coal interests of the Kanawha River, and the difference against the Monongahela interest is occasioned by the tolls, and is very injurious to the Monongahela.

Mr. INGALLS. Then those who are improving the navigation of the Kanawha are opposed to the purchase of these works on the Monongahela?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, I do not know that they are.

Mr. INGALLS. I thought that was the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. KENNA. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that there is no connection between the two corporations.

Mr. McMILLAN. None at all. The Monongahela interests insist that, the Government having improved the Kanawha River and the coal interests on that river not having the burden of toll, the Government should purchase these improvements and relieve the Monongahela interests from levying tolls upon their commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the whole paragraph, beginning with line 974 and ending with line 993.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that that amendment is not in order until the amendments of the committee have been acted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Chair is right, upon reflection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the next amendment made, as in Committee of the Whole, will be stated. Does the Senator from Vermont object to concurring in this amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Take the whole amendments of the committee together and then I will make a motion.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was, in line 981, of section 1, after the words "in order to," to strike out "ascertain the value of said works" and insert "acquire such information;" in line 982, after the words "appoint a," to strike out "commission" and insert "board;" in line 984, after the word "Army," to strike out "who" and insert "which board shall;" in line 985, after the word "case," to strike out "shall value and appraise the same, and;" in line 986, after the word "report," to insert "thereon;" and in line 987, after the word "session," to strike out "and the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this provision" and insert "and the cost of such examination shall be paid out of the sum appropriated by this act for surveys;" so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the value and commercial importance of the works and property of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company, situated on the Green and Barren Rivers, in the State of Kentucky, and the works of the Monongahela Navigation Company, situated on the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania; and in order to acquire such information the Secretary of War shall appoint a board of three competent engineers from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, which board shall in each case report to the Secretary of War, who shall report thereon to Congress at its next succeeding session; and the cost of such examination shall be paid out of the sum appropriated by this act for surveys: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as committing Congress to the purchase of the said works.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move to strike out the whole paragraph as amended.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to the whole bill are to be gone through with, and then a motion to strike out this paragraph or any other will be in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On what principle or on what practice of the Senate is that? We have made no such agreement. If when we are dealing with a paragraph we can not move to strike it all out, I should be glad to know under what law of the Senate it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the common and usual practice of the Senate is to first go through with the amendments reported from the committee, especially from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are not in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are in the Senate and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are to be acted on first.

Mr. KENNA. We are unable to hear on this side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to strike out the paragraph in regard to the Monongahela River and the Green and Barren Rivers. The Chair is of the opinion that until the Senate acts on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole it would not be in order to propose such an amendment. It is the established practice of the Senate, and the Chair believes it is according according to the rule, to act first upon the amendments of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then as I have been misled by my ignorance of parliamentary law, I should like to have these amendments considered open for a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They can be passed over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish them passed over. I should like to have the judgment of the Senate to consent that they be considered as open.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be regarded as open.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move to amend the amendment of the committee so that from line 974 to line 993 the whole clause be stricken out. I will see if I can stand on my rights there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee so as to make it an amendment to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. INGALLS. But the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, the Chair has declared that they shall be considered open.

Mr. KENNA. That amendment is certainly not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order. Until the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been acted upon the Chair is of opinion that it is not in order to move to strike out the whole paragraph in which an amendment is made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not move to strike out the whole paragraph. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENNA. We have only reached one amendment, and I ask if the whole clause is open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the first one where the Committee of the Whole proposes to strike out the words in line 975 to "negotiate for the purchase," and I move to amend that amendment so it will read that the whole paragraph be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that that amendment is not in order until the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the whole bill are acted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I move to amend the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think it is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it not in order to amend the amendment of the Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, that is a new law that I did not know before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

Mr. INGALLS. Will it be in order after the bill has thus been gone through with to return to this paragraph and move to strike it out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Clearly so. The Chair is clearly of that opinion.

Mr. HARRIS. The whole bill will be open to amendment after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any amendment one can propose to this amendment of the Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly the words proposed to be inserted can be amended, but the Senator knows that better than the Chair. The Senator from Vermont must be aware that it is the uniform practice here not to allow the text to be stricken out until the amendments of the Committee of the Whole have been acted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I do not move to strike out the text. I propose to amend the amendment that the Committee of the Whole proposes here by making it a different amendment altogether to that which the Committee of the Whole has reported. If the Chair says that is not in order and the Senate acquiesces, I have nothing more to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of that opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good. The whole subject will be open after the amendments are gone through with, as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to the paragraph will be regarded as concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 1031, after the words "lock and," to strike out "dam" and insert "approaches;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Saint Mary's River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, by a new lock and approaches, $250,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the amendment beginning in line 994?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole disagreed to that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any time when it will be in order to move to try that over again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unquestionably, as soon as the amendments of the Committee of the Whole are acted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to reserve that.

Mr. VEST. Has the amendment in line 994 been passed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was not agreed to as in Committee of the Whole. That amendment can be renewed in the Senate after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are gone through with. The next amendment made as Committee of the Whole will be stated.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in line 1039, after the word "city," to insert "and $5,000 in improving the west channel along West Bay City;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Saginaw River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $15,000; of which $22,500 are to be used above Bay City, and $5,000 in improving the west channel of West Bay City.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is that? That does not appear in the bill. Will the committee explain that?

Mr. McMILLAN. It was inserted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in the estimate?

Mr. INGALLS. It merely distributes the amounts.

Mr. CONGER. That applies to a part of the Saginaw River. The preceding clause appropriates $22,500 above Bay City, and this amendment gives $5,000 for the west channel of West Bay City.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota to consent to let this bill be laid aside and let me call up the naval appropriation bill. Does he object to that?

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall object to that.

Mr. HALE. It is important to get that bill into conference; and this bill will evidently take several days to go through the Senate. I think the naval appropriation bill certainly ought to be pushed forward and passed and sent to the House in order that we may get it into conference. I hope the Senator will agree to give way.

Mr. McMILLAN. That bill can be taken up to-morrow during the morning hour.

Mr. HALE. It is a bill that has no controversies; it will take but little time; but if I wait until the river and harbor bill is finished, I shall evidently have to wait for days.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think we shall get through with this bill to-night, if the Senator will permit us to go on.

Mr. HALE. I will not urge the Senator to yield now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be stated.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, after line 1039, to insert:

For the purchase of the two improved water ways known as the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-canal Railway and Iron Company Canal, being the improved harbors of refuge and the water communication across Keweenaw Point, from Keweenaw Bay to Lake Superior, by way of Portage River and lake, in the State of Michigan, and to make the same a free passage-way and harbor of refuge to commerce and navigation, $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That before said money shall be expended the Secretary of War shall cause an examination to be made by a board of three engineers to ascertain and report upon the importance and value of the free use of said two harbors of refuge and the water communication across Keweenaw Point to the commerce and navigation of the lakes, and the reasonableness of the price therefor, and shall have received from said board a report favorable to such purchase by the United States, and also upon full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said two harbors of refuge, canals, easements, rights of way, piers, docks, and appurtenances of every nature belonging to and connected with said works, or either of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have the chairman of the committee tell us what this project is and how much money and property of the United States has already been given to the people who now own these works to build them.

Mr. McMILLAN. The whole case was stated very fully and distinctly by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] when this item was up as in Committee of the Whole. He stated all the facts in regard to it very fully. It was very fully discussed in Committee of the Whole, and there was no opposition to it when the vote was taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is rather a large operation. The Chief of Engineers, in response to a resolution of the Senate (and we know how such resolutions of inquiry pass) "calling for a detailed report concerning the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-canal and the interest of the State of Michigan therein; also, as to the rights, titles," &c.—I condense as much as I can to save time—"with the view to securing said canal and improvement for the purpose of making same a free water way," &c., reports that he has got a report from Colonel Poe.

It will appear that the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company and the Lake Superior Ship-canal, Railway, and Iron Company—

Which I suppose must be a company intended for the regulation of commerce among the States—are willing to dispose of their property to the United States.

That part of it I have no doubt is true—

for the sum of $350,000—

And that of course is very modest and generous—about one-tenth of the cost of the improvements—

Though he does not mention who paid for the improvements—

And that Colonel Poe is of opinion that if the ownership of this important water way, clear of all incumbrances, can be vested in the Government, * * * there can be no question but that the price is reasonable, &c.

Then comes the report of Colonel Poe, in which it appears that the United States has given to the State of Michigan, actually certified and patented, 398,720.52 acres of land to build this canal upon the terms I suppose—and I should be supposed to be a rival of this bill if I took time to see what the terms are; the terms are of no consequence on a measure of this kind—upon the terms I suppose that this company taking the land and building the canal through this slough that went across Keweenaw Point should keep it up and should charge only reasonable tolls for the passage of commerce through it.

The original canal company having failed, a receiver was appointed with authority to borrow money.

The usual course when you appoint a receiver. There is no other real use for a receiver than to borrow money, and he borrowed and received $450,000, which would be about 90 cents an acre for the land that the United States had granted for the purpose.

The receipts from tolls from 1874 down to 1883, which is nine years, amounted in the aggregate to $75,000—I leave off the odd hundreds to condense—and the expenditures amounted to $70,000, leaving off the odd hundreds. Then they issued mortgage bonds for the construction of the canal, on their face, exclusive of interest, amounting to $3,300,000. That is the mortgage on the property, except so far as it has been reduced, that the United States is to assume in taking it—$3,300,000; and then the receiver's certificates—whether they are paid or not yet I do not know—$625,300; and then the $70,000 from tolls, as stated before.

But I am in entire ignorance as to the amount obtained from the hypothecation of the $3,300,000 mortgage bond and expended on the canal. Still, from all the testimony, and especially that contained in Miscellaneous Document No. 50, House of Representatives, first session Forty-eighth Congress, the probability is great that the aid supplied from all sources and applied to the construction and repair of the canal and in operating it, down to the beginning of 1884, amounted to fully $3,000,000.

And apparently the bonds issued are $3,300,000, a mortgage on the property. How much money they got from the bonds, whether the contractors took them at 10 per cent. or 20 per cent., nobody knows from this report so far as I have gone.

It will be seen from Appendix C that the two companies controlling this water way are practically one, as the parties in interest are the same. It is proposed to convey to the United States a clear title to both canals, and all their rights, privileges, and appurtenances, for the sum of $350,000.

These outstanding bonds, then, must be a kind of a myth apparently, for we are to have a clear title with $3,000,000 bonds out, for $350,000. I see now; I come to see what has become of the bonds.

I have endeavored to ascertain whether, in case of purchase, this sum would cover the entire cost to the United States, and am assured that it would; that all indebtedness, by mortgage or otherwise, existing prior to May 15, 1877, on the property of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-canal Company—

He does not speak of the other—was canceled by the sale of that date—

That is, it was sold under a mortgage, I suppose—and that none has accrued since; and that there is not now, and never was, any bonded debt or mortgage on the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company's property.

It has not been practicable for me to obtain a statement of the receipts and expenditures of this latter company on account of construction, maintenance, and operating—

Why it is not practicable he does not say—but I think it can be safely assumed that the construction account alone would amount to fully $300,000. If the above estimate of the minimum cost of the property of the Lake Superior Ship-canal, Railway and Iron Company ($3,000,000)——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senator that we are operating under the five-minute rule on amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the Senator will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone this bill indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is in order on that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was under that impression myself. He continues:

If the above estimate of the minimum cost of the property of the Lake Superior Ship-canal, Railway and Iron Company—

Which again comes in—and that of the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company—

Three million dollars for one and $300,000 for the other—is warranted by the facts disclosed—

That is, if it is warranted by the facts disclosed—

then the price asked for the two ($350,000) may be stated as only one-tenth the original cost. And if, by the payment of that sum by the United States to the companies in question, the ownership of this important water way, clear of all incumbrances, can be vested in the Government, * * * then there can be no question—

I skip some of the words in order to condense—

But that the price is reasonable. * * *

In conclusion, I invite attention to the readiness with which the canal companies gave me such information as was in their power.

One point of objection would be how much they got for the $3,000,000 bonds, how much money actually went in that they did not get. They had no power themselves to tell what had become of the bonds or the money.

Without this commendable action upon their part I would have been utterly unable to obtain any information of value for the purposes of this inquiry.

Then he goes on with his details and dates and statements, from which it appears, as I said before, that the work was assigned to a corporation by the State of Michigan to whom these lands were granted to the extent of 400,000 acres, and which received patents for 398,720.52 acres, worth at the minimum price you will see, at a dollar and a quarter an acre, half a million of money. The State of Michigan under that grant undertook to build that canal and keep it up.

From one cause or another, and it would take a good while to go into all the causes, while we have no petitions from ship-owners or complaint that the tolls are excessive, it is found convenient that these companies shall sell out this property to the United States for $350,000 in order that the burden of keeping up the property so that vessels can go through it shall be transferred from a company in the State of Michigan under this grant to the United States.

First we furnish the lands to build the work to the State that undertakes to do it and keep it up. Then it being done and being found not to be a profitable investment, we are asked, as we are in this instance and in three or four or five others, to turn around and buy the property back again under color of relieving commerce, but as a fact and result relieving corporations and States from a duty that they had undertaken to perform for a consideration.

I can not vote for that sort of a thing, Mr. President, and I ask for the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I will detain the Senate but a moment. There was a very full statement of the situation of this canal made when this matter was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The burden to commerce last year alone, the tolls upon the vessels and merchandise passing here, was $64,000, which is paid by the commerce on those lakes and by the people in the copper mines there. Last year there were $6,000,000 of commerce that passed through that were mined in Portage Lake, which forms a part of this canal. Six million dollars of commerce by ships passed from this midway channel between two parts of the lake to market, besides all the other things there. I need not dwell upon those things.

One of these canals never had any aid from the Government; the other one had aid from the Government. The whole of these canals could not be bought for five times this money except for the fact that in the charters of the State of Michigan there is a provision that the property may be, upon the payment of tolls and interest, condemned. It was the fear of that, I think, which induced this company to yield to the demands of commerce to make this a free canal, saving 150 or 180 miles of travel on Lake Superior from White Fish Point on the foot of the lake to Duluth, and avoiding a very long and dangerous going around Keweenaw Point.

Five States have, by joint resolution of their Legislatures, requested

Congress to make this a free canal. Almost every board of trade from New York to San Francisco has urged Congress to make this a free canal. There are filed here more than a thousand names of vessel-owners and navigators of the lakes asking Congress to make this a free canal; and that has been urged for years. Those things were all stated before, and I think the members of the Senate understand the importance and the propriety of this work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall ask for the yeas and nays at the proper time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have not said anything in reference to any provision of this bill. I find this provision in harmony with several other provisions of the bill which propose to commit the Government to the purchase of artificial highways of commerce, a thing that I believe has not been heretofore done perhaps in more than one instance. Against that policy of committing the Government to the purchase of works of internal improvement, artificial works belonging to States or to corporations, I am opposed.

I think we are extending the powers of Congress sufficiently when we appropriate to natural highways, the rivers, and bays, &c., of the country for commerce; but when it is proposed to add to that the purchase of artificial highways which have been erected by States and corporations, I think it is extending our power far beyond what is legitimate.

As an original proposition I should deny utterly that the power to regulate commerce gave to Congress the right to appropriate money for cleaning out rivers and harbors; but the policy of the Government has been so long in the other direction that I suppose we have got to acquiesce in that, and therefore I have interposed no objection to any appropriation for natural highways of commerce. But when this proposition and similar propositions are incorporated in a river and harbor bill to commit the Government to the purchase of artificial highways which have either been incepted or consummated by States or by corporations, I say again I think it is carrying the powers of Congress far beyond what was anticipated by the framers of the Constitution.

With that conviction resting upon my mind, for such provisions as this in the bill I can not vote. The Hennepin Canal is another of those things. We have just as much power and right according to my judgment to ditch the lowlands and make them arable because the products of those lands will aid the commerce of the country as we have to construct the Hennepin Canal.

I shall not enter under the five-minute rule into a discussion of the question of the power of Congress, but for nearly one hundred years from the commencement of the Government no such idea was entertained as that of the power of Congress to cut a canal 65 miles long over an elevated plateau to connect the waters of the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan. Suppose you connect them, what is the advantage? You will tap the Mississippi River at a point where during the dry seasons of the year there is scarcely any navigation. It has only been a few years since there were appropriations proposed to dam up the waters of the Fox and other rivers for the purpose of making a navigation in the Upper Mississippi, and yet you propose to tap the Upper Mississippi and connect it with Lake Michigan, where, I suppose, at certain seasons of the year a schooner carrying 50 tons could not navigate it.

Such propositions as these are calculated in my opinion to bring all river and harbor bills into disrepute in the estimation of the people of the country. I know the great anxiety of the people to have their streams, their rivers, and creeks, &c., cleaned out where navigation exists, but I say such propositions as this will and ought to bring all such bills into disrepute before the country, and I do not hesitate to say that if I had the absolute power no such bill as this would pass.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, in regard to the parties who desire or who propose to sell this canal to the United States I have very little to say. I have no sympathy with them. I think they got all that the canal cost them in lands from the United States.

But there is one point which should be considered, and it is not for Michigan that I speak, nor for any particular interest of Michigan. This is in the line of interstate-commerce, a subject which occupied the Senate for so many days and weeks at the present session.

There are two points on the great lakes which have been from time immemorial a terror to mariners. One is Saginaw Bay and the other is Keweenaw Point. For two hundred years that point is known to have been one of the most dangerous on the whole lake. This canal saves a detour of 100 or 150 miles. If any Senator will look at the map he will see that Keweenaw Point reaches out like an index finger into Lake Superior. It is the only point where a canal could be cut across that peninsula. It is on the line of one of the old French portages, probably established a hundred and fifty years ago, where two streams run up into the interior and a short cut joins them.

It was that which first suggested the canal. It was that which first brought about the appropriation, which was 400,000 acres of land, to the parties who built it. They could have bought the land much cheaper than it cost them to build the canal. It probably cost them over $3,000,000. The land could have been bought for $500,000. But that is the only point where a canal can be built across that peninsula.

When we look at the vast and constantly developing commerce of Lake Superior it seems to me it is a very wise thing for the States west of Lake Superior to secure the purchase of this canal and put it into the hands of the General Government. Two harbors of refuge, one at either end of it may be established. Any one who knows anything about Lake Superior knows that it is one of the most treacherous and tempestuous of lakes.

I send to the desk a letter which was published some years ago showing the general estimate in which Keweenaw Point is held by mariners.

The gentleman who wrote the letter I know very well. He has been connected with the commerce of the lakes for very many years. He wrote this letter without any reference, I imagine, to the present action of Congress. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Some ten or twelve years since, and before Portage Lake Canal was completed, I was sent to Duluth about the beginning of November, there to meet and take charge of a vessel loaded with very important supplies.

I remained there a week, in hourly expectation of her arrival. The weather was fine, and the reports I got by telegraph from Portage and Marquette were favorable.

The weather at all three points afforded no explanation of the detention.

Ultimately it was found that the steamer, after buffeting heavy weather for ten days, which prevailed around Keweenaw Point and did not extend 30 miles south of it, laid up in Copper Harbor.

This one trip could have contributed at least $2,000 to the purchase of the canal if it had been successful.

Doubling Keweenaw Point takes a vessel nearly a degree further north than passing through the canal; and if any of your readers will study a good map showing isothermal lines and consult some sailors who have navigated those waters they will satisfy themselves that it is a place to be avoided, especially at certain seasons.

A weather station placed there would give some singular information, and I earnestly hope some day to see this done.

The advantage to coasting vessels engaged on the American shore would be incalculable.

The work should be managed as the "Sault" Canal is managed, and should be free to all comers.

I know not and care not what other parties or corporations are to be benefited. But most earnestly do I hope to see this important work under proper control and free from all exactions.

J. W. THOMPSON,
Agent L. S. T. Co.

PORT HURON, January 29.

Mr. PALMER. What I have to say is that, although the mines in Michigan will be measurably benefited, the great benefit will come to the States west of Lake Superior. That commerce has developed in such a remarkable manner that it needs the care and attention of Congress; and my opinion is that this one improvement when made under the auspices of the General Government will reduce the price of carrying grain from Duluth to Buffalo one-half cent per bushel. In addition to that, large iron mines, which, from nothing three years ago, will ship 2,000,000 tons of iron ore this year, are being developed on the west part of Lake Superior, and that will all have to come down through the Sault Canal. That needs the protection of these harbors of refuge and needs all the facilities that Congress can give.

It seems to me this is in the line of legitimate interstate commerce, and on that ground I base it.

My colleague has spoken of the copper mines which have furnished from that district and adjacent to it $174,000,000 worth of copper in the past twenty years. Those mines have brought copper from 30 cents a pound down to 11 cents a pound. It seems to me that it demands recognition and that Congress should grant it by voting for this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much of the copper is produced west of this canal?

Mr. PALMER. Hardly any of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose not. Therefore the copper question does not affect the canal question very largely.

Mr. PALMER. The copper mines get the benefit in the reduction of tolls, as my colleague said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But as all the copper goes East and as the canal is west of the copper, it is not much affected by the tolls.

Mr. PALMER. It has to come through the canal; and the business which has been created by these copper mines is now paying $60,000 a year toll on these canals; but I am not speaking of that particularly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On which side of the canal is Holton?

Mr. PALMER. It is between the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-canal. One was a private enterprise and the other had 400,000 acres given to it by the General Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And given to the State of Michigan on these terms:

That the Legislature of said State shall cause to be kept an accurate account of the sales and net proceeds of the lands hereby granted—

Granted for building and keeping up this canal—and of all expenditures in the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, and of the earnings thereof, and shall return a statement of the same annually to the Secretary of the Interior—

If the State of Michigan has done that, it does not appear in any of these printed reports that I can find; and my objection to this item in this appropriation bill on that point is not on the question of whether it stood as a measure by itself, to be understood by itself from bottom to top, right or wrong. I might not agree to it; but here it is ridden on a bill which in its title professes to be merely for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the United States, and not for buying rivers and harbors or places to improve. That might be one thing; but in the time that we all feel compelled to limit ourselves to on an appropriation bill it is quite impossible to understand exactly how this matter stands. We do not know what have been these earnings and expenditures for construction and receipts and so on. The reports may be in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, but we have them not here—and whenever said State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, with legal interest on all advances, until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from said lands and canal, with such interest, the said State shall be allowed to tax for the use of said canal only such tolls as shall be sufficient to pay all necessary expenses for the care, charge, and repair of the same.

Now what do we know about it? The contract with the State of Michigan, if she accepted this grant as she did, was that, receiving 400,000 acres of land, not to be selected along the line of this canal, but anywhere in what is called the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, valuable for timber and ores, she should show an open hand and keep an open account, and that when she was reimbursed for her outlay then this canal should be free, except in respect of the mere nominal tax against this great commerce of millions and millions, as it is said, of keeping it up.

I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that he had no doubt that the people who had gone through with this performance under the State of Michigan had got their money back. Having gotten it back, why on this contract with Michigan should we pay $350,000?

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to answer?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Because we can not get it in any other way that I know of, and it is the only route through that peninsula. I would say let it have the go-by if there was any other point on that peninsula where we could make a canal and cut off that detour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But to get at the real truth of the matter, the only tax to be imposed on this vast commerce—and the vaster it is the less the tax to each ton of freight—is the tax to keep up that canal. How long is it?

Mr. PALMER. About 60 miles.

Mr. CONGER. This is a level tide-water canal. There is no lock, no dam, nothing of the kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it. I have been through it.

Mr. CONGER. I know the Senator has been through it, and I know the Senator only asks these questions for the purpose of seeing how much we know about it. He knows all about it. If he would seek light from the other side he would make it appear a great deal better than I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is mistaken. The canal is an important canal and a valuable canal, but we have paid for the canal out of the Treasury of the people of the United States, and we have provided in paying for it that the tax upon this vast commerce shall be so low that now it shall only pay the expense of keeping up a canal that has no locks or dams, and no tide, with great respect to my friend who said it was a tide-water canal. That was a mere slip, of course. The only thing is simply to keep open a sluiceway there through that low sag that divides the rocky promontory of Keweenaw Point from the other part of the northern peninsula. So the tax per ton on copper to keep up a canal, if the commerce is as great as it is said to be, as I dare say it is, would not be a cent a ton. And yet the United States is called upon to pay close toward half a million dollars to make it free, that half million dollars to go into the pockets of somebody who will profit by it, because by the terms on which the property was given they have no legal right now to charge any toll in excess merely of the nominal expense of keeping up a canal which has neither lock nor dam nor anything to be done with it except the simple thing of keeping an open water way where there is neither drift nor tide nor river to disturb it.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. PLUMB's name was called). The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] requested me to announce his pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on this question.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I understand that he would vote "nay" if present, and I therefore record my vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 1073, after the word "Congress," to insert:

And the sum of $8,000 of the above appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended above Portage City to prevent the overflow of the Wisconsin River into the Upper Fox River, so as to prevent injury to the Government works on Fox River; and this expenditure may be made separately or, if deemed more economical by the Secretary of War, in adding to any protecting works which may be made by the State of Wisconsin.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Fox River, Wisconsin: Continuing improvement below Montello, on the approved plan, $75,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to have the examination and survey of the Wisconsin River from Portage to the mouth, now being made by a board of engineers, completed as soon as practicable, and a report thereof made on or before the meeting of the next session of Congress. And the sum of $8,000 of the above appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended above Portage City to prevent the overflow of the Wisconsin River into the Upper Fox River, so as to prevent injury to the Government works on Fox River; and this expenditure may be made separately or, if deemed more economical by the Secretary of War, in adding to any protecting works which may be made by the State of Wisconsin.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in line 1089 of section 1, after the word "dollars," to strike out "of which" and insert "and;" so as to read:

Improving Wabash River, Indiana and Illinois: Continuing work on lock and dams at Grand Rapids and on the river from Grand Rapids to its mouth, $80,000; and $12,000 to be expended on the river at Grayville, Ill.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1095, after the word "improvement," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "forty;" and in the same line, after the word "which," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" and after the word "used," in line 1096, to strike out "in dredging the river between the Forks and a point half a mile east of Hammond" and insert "between the Forks and one-half mile east of Hammond, Ind., $7,500 of which are to be used in dredging the river between the Forks and the State line of Illinois and Indiana, and $10,500 to be expended in the river at Hammond, Ind.;" so as to read:

Improving Calumet River, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $40,000; of which $15,000 are to be used between the Forks and one-half a mile east of Hammond, Ind.; $7,500 of which are to be used in dredging the river between the Forks and the State line of Illinois and Indiana, and $10,500 to be expended in the river at Hammond, Ind.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, in the first proviso to the clause making appropriations for "improving Calumet River, Illinois," in line 1099, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That no part of said sum, nor any sum heretofore appropriated, except the said $15,000 for the river above the Forks, shall be expended until the entire right of way, as set forth in Senate Executive Document No. 9, second session, Forty-seventh Congress, shall have been conveyed to the United States free of expense, and the United States shall be fully released from all liability for damages to adjacent property-owners, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War; and if any of the owners of real estate required to be taken or that is damaged for the purpose of straightening or widening that portion of the Calumet River for which the appropriation herein is now made can not be induced to convey to the United States such real estate so required, and release their claim for damages caused by said improvement, or should the owner or owners be incapable of conveying and releasing, or should his or her name or residence be unknown, or he or she be a non-resident of the State of Illinois, it shall then be the duty of the United States attorney for the northern district of Illinois to immediately file a petition in any court having jurisdiction thereof, in the manner and as authorized by the laws of the State of Illinois in such cases, for the purpose of ascertaining the just compensation to be paid to the respective owners of the land taken or damaged.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, in the second proviso of the clause making appropriations "for improving Calumet River, Illinois," in line 1123, after the word "first," to strike out "contribute" and insert "execute a bond to the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the payment of," so as to read:

Provided, however, That the other owners of property and parties interested in said improvement shall first execute a bond to the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the payment of costs, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us understand that. I see that this goes into a question of judicial proceedings and operations and the obtaining of property, and provides that, instead of the owners and parties interested in the improvement that we are going promptly to do for them being called upon, as the House bill had it, to contribute first their proportion of the costs and expenses, they are to contribute a bond instead of contributing money.

Mr. McMILLAN. Execute a bond.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Execute a bond instead of contributing a bond, but it comes to about the same thing. This may be perfectly correct or it may not. I do not know.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will see that the provision there is for an improvement and obtaining the right of way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not making a criticism. I am only trying to understand what it means, and to say once for all perhaps that it is evident that a majority of the Senate is determined to put these five or six schemes standing together and for each other, to purchase property that the United States has once paid for and to turn it over——

Mr. LOGAN. Is the Senator talking about the Calumet improvement?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am talking of what I am speaking about.

Mr. LOGAN. That property has never been purchased by the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not talking about the Calumet River at all at present.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what line 1124 is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it is, but I am explaining why I am not going to take up the time of the Senate on a variety of these things, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am saying on this topic which the chairman has explained, as to the form of this improvement or the form of the House phrase, that it seems to be evident—and I am bound to bow to the will of a majority of the Senate with great respect—that a majority of the Senate is in favor of these five or six different measures which have no relation to an appropriation bill at all, but which provide separately and together, jointly and severally, for the purchase and obtaining by the United States in one way and another of these works, taking them off from the hands of States and of State corporations, even where the United States has granted the means of building these public works, and has required as a consideration therefor that the State shall keep them up and reduce the tolls to the mere nominal expense of preservation. I am bound to suppose that each one of these would go if it were all alone; and I am bound to believe that each one of them will go much faster and better, supported by the comfortable assurance of taking all the others.

It is useless, therefore, as I stated in regard to a great many of the small items in this bill, for a Senator who does not wish to delay the action of the Senate or impede it to take up time in resisting that which can not be resisted; and so if I am silent all the rest of the time I do not wish the Senate, or the people of that part of the country where I come from, to suppose that I have agreed to every other provision in this bill as a suitable and proper one.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, after the word "such," at the end of line 1125 of section 1, to strike out "proceeding, and shall furnish the amount necessary," and insert "proceedings and;" after the word "rendered," at the end of line 1127, to insert "therein;" and in line 1128, before the word "shall," to strike out "cause" and insert "proceedings;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That the other owners of property and parties interested in said improvement shall first execute a bond to the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the payment of the costs of such proceedings, and to pay any judgment that may be rendered therein; and on failure to do so the proceedings shall be dismissed.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Did the Chair announce that that was agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Chair did.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to call for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; that is the one already passed and voted on.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. There were no yeas and nays called on it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not ask for them on this.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I want to state that this is the fourth paragraph of this bill on which we have been called upon to vote which suggests that the Government of the United States should buy the property of private corporations.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no such proposition in this amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. There is nothing in either one of the four paragraphs to which I referred where there can be any denial of the suggestion I make.

Mr. PLATT. What is this amendment?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I state here that you have just passed one paragraph that the Senators from the State themselves—I mean the Senators coming from the State that is interested through a large corporation—do not undertake to deny that we are proposing to buy a canal from a private corporation.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is mistaken. This has no reference to a canal.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, I may be mistaken; but let Senators get up here and show wherein and whereof the mistake is. This is a bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors." What is the corporation that you propose to buy that canal of that you passed upon not fifteen minutes ago, on page 41, I think? Here you start out beginning with the word "whereas" the State of Michigan has received a certain amount of public land from the United States Government, and therefore the United States Government will go to Michigan and pay to get it back. I deny the right and the justice of it. Why should I not ask to ingraft into this bill following that paragraph that whereas the State of Virginia was known and is yet known to have given $15,000,000 to build a canal so that the waters of the Ohio could reach the Atlantic and transport the commerce of that time to the seaboard—why should I not put that with a "whereas," and then add that we will go and buy the old dried-out James River and Kanawha Canal?

Why should you not buy the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal? Why not buy any of them? Why not go and buy a railroad? Why not go and buy a telegraph line? Every time that some rotten corporations come to you and ask for something, even if they do not get the amount added to the end of the paragraph, as we see here they have in two instances failed to do, they manage by this sort of legislation to bull the price of their property and make victims of innocent people.

The Senator from Vermont said he would give up. He may, but I never will. I say this bill if it shall ever pass simply makes the United States Government in four instances, and, reverently I may express it, God knows how many more, a bidder for stocks on the market; and, at the same time, we say in the bill that we are making appropriations to improve rivers and harbors!

I say more than that, this bill is worse than when it came to the Senate. You have increased nearly every appropriation made by the House with three or four exceptions. We are generous toward the Mississippi River, we are more than generous when we undertake to recite the purpose of improving rivers and improving harbors, and when we go into every little stream in the country and undertake to give $10,000 for it, not to improve the stream, but to get the Senators here or the members of the House at the other end of the Capitol to vote for this thing that they would not dare to vote for if they did not think it was something that would commend them to their constituents.

I prefer to go back to my constituents and tell them that the provision for the Monongahela was put in here. That is to buy a piece of property, as every Senator here knows, of a corporation either in the State of Pennsylvania or West Virginia or both. What right have you to take money out of the Treasury of the United States to buy a property that they want to give up? What right have you to go and put the Government on the market as a purchaser? If these persons did not want to sell, the proposition would not have been in here. If there had not been some man representing that corporation somewhere about this District of Columbia, there would be no such suggestion as we see here of the United States becoming the purchaser of the corporation's property.

So it is with this Michigan canal. Michigan got the land for nothing and if it were valuable to you, you would not come back here and ask us to pay you the money for it.

Those are two of the four paragraphs that have been read here today. Yesterday there were others. Take the bill through; separate rivers and harbors from creeks—I do not mean by that the creeks that we know carry commerce, for some commercial streams are called creeks; but I mean these little narrow-gauge streams where you catch trout in the mountains—separate them from the other rivers and the other harbors in the bill, and take out the interest that Senators represent in these little streams, and take out the interest that members of the House of Representatives represent, and you would not get enough votes to pass the enacting clause of the bill.

The Senator from Vermont gives it up. I suppose my time is nearly up, but I shall continue to express every reason why it should not pass. I do not propose to sanction the present policy. The last President representing the great Republican party vetoed a bill that was less—if I may be pardoned the expression, not meaning to say to the Senate that I would make application of such a word to any of them—less infamous than this. Now, you propose te saddle this bill, not upon a Democratic administration alone but upon the Treasury and the tax-paying people of this country, appropriating an enormous sum. If you put into this bill every stream that runs through all the counties of the State in which I live, if I knew that the money you had there were just to accomplish the purpose of passing the bill and knew as I know that it would not improve a river or a harbor, I would vote against it.

Mr. President, I ask pardon for again speaking to the Senate on this bill, and I suppose I shall have to ask pardon every time I take the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Before passing to the next amendment I desire to offer an amendment in line 1131, of which I gave notice. I do not wish to discuss it. I move to insert after the word "hundred" the words "and fifty." It is in reference to improving the Illinois River. I have discussed it heretofore and stated the reasons for it. It is a very important matter; but I do not wish to discuss it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Illinois that that is not in order until the amendments reported to the Senate by the Committee of the Whole have been acted upon.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, sir. I was misled by what the President of the Senate said before. I said that when we reached this clause I would offer the amendment, but it is no matter if I can offer it afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be stated.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, after line 1133, to insert:

The grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its rights of way, and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State of Illinois may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State of Illinois by the United States for canal purposes, made to the United States by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois approved April 28, 1882, be, and is hereby, accepted on the terms and conditions specified in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

For the construction of a canal from the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, to the Mississippi River, at above the mouth of Rock River, in said State, together with such feeders and other works that may be necessary to supply said canal with water, $300,000. Said canal shall be known as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and shall be constructed on such route as may be determined by the Secretary of War: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in order to secure the right of way for such canal and feeders, to acquire the title to such lands as may be necessary by agreement, purchase, or voluntary conveyance from the owners, if it can be done on reasonable terms; but if that shall be found impracticable, then the Secretary of War shall apply at any term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to be held thereafter, at any general or special term held in said district, and in the name of the United States institute and carry on proceedings to condemn such lands as may be necessary for right of way as aforesaid; and in such proceedings said court shall be governed by the laws of the State of Illinois, so far as the same may be applicable to the subject of condemning private property for public use: Provided further, That said canal shall be 80 feet wide at the water line and 7 feet deep, with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and all other erections and fixtures that may be necessary for safe and convenient navigation of said canal and branch as specified in said survey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate, but I merely suggest that, if I am rightfully informed about the state of the law in Illinois and elsewhere, private property can not be taken for public use without paying for it. This provides for taking it, but the appropriation of money is purely for the construction of the work, and it would be open to some considerable question, I am afraid, whether any part of this $300,000 could be devoted to paying land damages. But it is nothing to me. I merely mention the fact.

Mr. GORMAN. I suppose an amendment to the amendment is in order this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. GORMAN. I move, in line 1173, after the word "canal," to insert "feeder" and strike out "branch," to make it correspond with the first part of the amendment; so as to read:

That may be necessary for safe and convenient navigation of said canal and feeder, as specified in said survey.

The amendment as presented to the Committee on Commerce provided for the construction of a canal from Hennepin to the Mississippi River and a branch canal. It will be seen by looking at the amendment that the committee struck out "branch canal."

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no objection. The word "feeder" is proper there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be made, there being no objection to it. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 126) directing payment of the surplus in the Treasury on the public debt was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 15, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 14, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. BULLOCK, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The following Senate bills were severally laid before the House, read a first and second time, and referred as follows:

The bill (S. 1580) for the relief of Maj. James Belger—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 2529) for the relief of R. G. Huston & Co.—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 2545) to provide for the confinement of inebriates in the Government Hospital for the Insane—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 2560) for the relief of Hyland C. Kirk and others, assignees, &c.—to the Committee on Claims.

Joint resolution (S. R. 67) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect at Stony Point, N. Y., a monument—to the Committee on the Library.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAMMOND, indefinitely.

To Mr. O'HARA, indefinitely, on account of important business.

PUBLIC BUILDING, GALVESTON, TEX.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2475) to amend an act approved May 25, 1882, entitled "An act for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Tex.," and put it upon its passage as amended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Tex.," approved May 25, 1882, be amended so as to read that the proposed building shall be for the accommodation of all the Federal offices in that city, including post-office and Federal courts, and that the limits of cost of the said building, including cost of approaches, heating apparatus, and elevator, and inclusive of the cost of site, be $250,000.

SEC. 2. That authority is hereby given for the sale of the present court-house and post-office building and site, the proceeds of sale to be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $145,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in connection with moneys previously appropriated for this purpose.

The committee recommend the following amendments:

Strike out sections 2 and 3 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask if that bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. CRAIN. It has.

The SPEAKER. The committee report the bill and recommend the amendments which have been concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do the amendments increase or diminish the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. CRAIN. They increase it.

Mr. BURROWS. How much is the increase?

Mr. CRAIN. The law to amend which this bill is offered only authorized the construction of a custom-house, while the amendment provides for the erection of a building which shall afford accommodations for the collector of customs, the post-office, the collector of internal revenue, the signal service officer, the superintendent of the life-saving service, and other Federal offices.

Mr. BURROWS. But how much is the increase?

Mr. CRAIN. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. What was the original amount?

Mr. CRAIN. The original amount was $125,000; this increases it to $250,000.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRAIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OSHKOSH, WIS.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 57) for the erection of a public building at Oshkosh, Wis., and that it be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase by private sale or condemnation, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, internal-revenue office, post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Oshkosh, Wis. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and that no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Wisconsin shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein. For the purposes of this act the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended the following amendment:

After line 13 insert the following.

"Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to amend the bill by striking out the words "internal-revenue office."

Mr. GUENTHER. I agree to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUENTHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOUTH CAROLINA STATE TROOPS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 582) for the relief of the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Volunteer State troops, and that it be now considered.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand the words "preceding the late war."

Mr. DIBBLE. The words are, "after the legal termination of the late war."

Mr. BRAGG. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 9198) for the relief of Hiram F. Wordwell, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, should have been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. If there be no objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill (S. 1990) to provide for the adjustment of matters connected with certain judicial proceedings in Pennsylvania in which the United States was a party was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It should have gone to the Committee on Claims. Without objection that change of reference will be made.

SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the joint resolution which was under consideration at the adjournment yesterday. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 126) directing the payment of the surplus in the Treasury on the public debt.

Mr. MORRISON. Before making a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of this resolution, I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed at 3 o'clock to-day unless it be sooner closed by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. General debate?

Mr. MORRISON. That general debate be closed at 3 o'clock unless sooner closed by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYSON. How is it proposed that the time shall be divided?

Mr. MORRISON. As it always is divided.

Mr. PAYSON. That is very indefinite. I object.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution H. Res. 126; and pending that I move that all general debate on the resolution be closed at 3 o'clock.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have no objection to that; but I would not under that agreement be willing that any man should occupy an hour's time to the exclusion of everybody else. I suggest there should be an arrangement under which the time may be apportioned properly among those who wish the floor.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not know how the time can be apportioned among three hundred and twenty-five men; but I have never seen any disposition to unfairness in the distribution of time on either side.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have seen this: I have seen gentlemen occupying each a whole hour and excluding other men from the floor. I know the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] does not intend that, but a simple order to close debate may result that way.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to amend so as to close general debate at 4 o'clock.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I move to amend the amendment by saying half past 4. That will give time to dispose of the resolution before adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The motion is merely to close general debate. After that there will be the five-minutes' debate.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. PAYSON, there were—ayes 41, noes 85.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON to close general debate at 3 o'clock was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8974) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill numbered 119 and 233, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CRISP in the chair), and resumed consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 126) directing payment of the surplus in the Treasury on the public debt.

Mr. MORRISON. To make the resolution somewhat more explicit and definite, I propose to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

The surplus or balance herein referred to shall be the available surplus ascertained according to the form of statement of the United States Treasurer of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury of the United States employed on June 30, 1886.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Chairman, I intended yesterday to have followed the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and to have explained at some length the reasons why I am opposed to this joint resolution. I found myself then unable to take up the discussion, and I regret to say that, as is apparent from the condition of my voice, I am less able to-day to go into any elaborate discussion of this very important matter. I must content myself, therefore, with the reasons which were given in the minority report which I had the honor to present. If I had anticipated my inability to discuss the matter here I would have asked to have had that report printed in the RECORD. As it is, if I find myself unable to proceed I shall incorporate the minority report as part of the remarks which I offer this morning.

One or two points, however, brought out by the discussion which has taken place, I may be permitted to notice at this time. One objection to the resolution has been met by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] this morning. As the resolution was reported to the House, $29,000,000 of subsidiary coin would have been included in the Treasury balance, so that, as a matter of fact, the available balance under the resolution would have been reduced to $71,000,000. That defect is corrected by the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has just offered.

Another objection which I hoped he would meet, and which I think must have escaped his notice, is probably based upon an inadvertence. The resolution provides that whenever the surplus in the Treasury exceeds $100,000,000, a call of ten millions of bonds shall be made. The effect would be that if this resolution were adopted, and if the surplus reached $101,000,000, a call would have to be made which would reduce the available surplus to ninety-one millions.

Mr. MORRISON. No, no.

Mr. HEWITT. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means shakes his head and says "No, no," but this is a matter of language and construction, and I simply submit the question to the consideration of the House and of the gentleman himself, and suggest that, if he does not intend that effect, he had better modify the language of his resolution so as to provide that whenever the surplus reaches $110,000,000 there shall be a call of ten millions. That will place his intention beyond doubt.

The gentleman from Illinois in his report and in the remarks which he made yesterday bases his advocacy of this joint resolution upon the saving of the interest which it will effect. Assuming that $75,000,000 is the amount over $100,000,000 which, under this resolution, would have now to be paid out, the saving in interest would be about two and a quarter million dollars per annum. He also says that it will release from the Treasury $100,000,000, which hundred millions would go into the channels of trade and give employment to one hundred thousand men, and the gentleman from Tennessee added that it will thus support five hundred thousand people. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is too well acquainted with the principles which govern business not to know that if this act should impair public confidence the saving of two and a quarter million of dollars would be a case of "saving at the spigot and losing at the bung-hole." The disturbance of business would be so serious that a couple of millions of dollars would be of no consequence, and, in fact, would be daily lost in the commercial transactions of the country.

But as to employment, one hundred thousand men would be dismissed from employment on the very first day when the public should begin to realize that under the operation of this resolution the stability of the Treasury was impaired and its ability to meet its obligations was undermined. Therefore, such considerations as the saving of $2,000,000 a year, or the possible employment of one hundred thousand men, are trifling in comparison with the danger and disturbance which would result if the financial transactions of the Government were seriously interfered with by the operation of this resolution. But the gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the release of this money from the Treasury would set a single additional man to work, unless it be the men who would have to count the money when it came out of the Treasury.

There are to-day idle in the city of New York more than $75,000,000 of unemployed capital. If that capital could be made profitable it would be employed to-morrow, and if this $75,000,000 comes from the Treasury of the United States, it will not be given to the men who are short of means and are seeking for capital; it will be paid to the bondholders, and the bondholders, who are supposed to be capitalists or to represent capitalists, will simply deposit the proceeds in a market already gorged with superabundant capital, and not a single additional human being will be employed in consequence of this release. I refer to these considerations now because they were not urged at the time the report was made, but have been urged in debate here, and I think this the proper place to make answer to them.

Upon one or two other points brought out by the debate I wish to say a few words. My colleague from New York, who is also my colleague on the committee [Mr. HISCOCK], has stated that the introduction of this resolution and the peculiar manner in which it has been brought before this House for discussion is a declaration of war on the part of the Democratic majority of the House against a Democratic administration. It must be conceeded, I think, that this resolution is at war with the declared policy and practice of the administration.

I think this is not disputed on either side of the House. Hence, governed by the ordinary rules of party management, I was exceedingly anxious to avoid the discussion of the resolution; and I resisted the adoption of the amendment to the rules by which it was brought on. But I was reminded by what happened of the time when I used to recite "The boy stood on the burning deck, whence all but he had fled;" for I found that I was not only the only Democrat who voted against the resolution, but notwithstanding what my friend from Illinois says about New York men, I was the only member from the city of New York who resisted its consideration. Hence I suppose there are some occasions on which the New York men do not hold together on the money question. Perhaps it is best to have the discussion. I think it very likely they were right, and that I was wrong in trying to resist the discussion; for in a country governed by public opinion, it is well that every great question affecting the employments of the people should be ventilated here and elsewhere; and any attempt to repress the judgment of the people would in my opinion be an error.

Hence I do not consider that the action of the Committee of Ways and Means in reporting this resolution, or of the Committee on Rules in bringing it before the House, is a declaration of war against the administration. If, however, it should be adopted, I should regard it as a vote of want of confidence in the policy of the administration, which under other forms of government would lead to the resignation of the ministry and under our form of government would lead to a change in the practice of the administration, because the administration is governed by law, and law is expressed by the action of Congress when approved by the President.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] seemed to think there was a pledge given in the Democratic platform for bringing this measure before Congress. As usual on that side of the House the Democratic platform has not been very carefully studied by the gentleman from New York. There is no such pledge in the platform; and there is not a syllable in it which indicates that any action ought to be taken by the Democratic House in order to bring down the surplus in the Treasury. There is a declaration that the surplus of taxation should be reduced, and there is an allegation that $100,000,000 could be taken from the taxes of the people and the Treasury still have ample means for carrying on its business. When that declaration was made it was true. The effort has been made to give effect to that declaration of the platform, and thus far it has failed. But the declaration on the money question was most explicit:

We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss.

That is the only declaration contained in the platform on the subject of the money of the country. The gentleman from Illinois and I were concerned in the preparation of that declaration. Neither he nor I nor any other Democrat on the committee which reported that declaration dissented from a single word or line of it. The President of the United States, when he accepted the nomination of his party, planted himself squarely upon the declarations of the platform. He went into no detail, but he accepted it in a broad and generous declaration; and I have reason to know that the President regards his promise to observe the declarations of the platform to be as binding upon his conscience and his action as is his oath to support the Constitution and maintain the laws of the country. He has never left us in any doubt as to how he construed that declaration of the platform. Prior to his inauguration, in the famous letter addressed to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], who gave us yesterday such an able and bountiful exposition of the facts of the currency, he recites the condition of the Treasury and then uses this language:

These being the facts of our present condition, our danger, and our duty to avert that danger would seem to be plain. I hope that you concur with me and with the great majority of our fellow-citizens in deeming it most desirable at the present juncture to maintain and continue in use the mass of our gold coin as well as the mass of silver already coined. This is possible by a present suspension of the purchase and coinage of silver. I am not aware that any other method is possible. It is of momentous importance to prevent the two metals from parting company—to prevent the increasing displacement of gold by the increasing coinage of silver, to prevent the disuse of gold in the custom-houses of the United States in the daily business of the people, to prevent the ultimate expulsion of gold by silver. Such a financial crisis as these events would naturally precipitate, were it now to follow upon so long a period of commercial depression, would involve the people of every city and every State in the Union in prolonged and disastrous trouble. The revival of business enterprise and prosperity so ardently desired and apparently so near would be hopelessly postponed. Gold would be withdrawn to its hoarding places. An unprecedented contraction in the actual volume of our currency would speedily take place. Saddest of all, in every workshop, mill, factory, store, and on every railroad and car the wages of labor, already depressed, would suffer still further depression by a scaling down in the purchasing power of every so-called dollar paid into the hand of toil. From these impending calamities it is surely a most patriotic and grateful duty of the representatives of the people to deliver them.

This was the declaration of Grover Cleveland before he became President of the United States. When he became President he was confronted with the very difficulties which he had outlined in that letter to General WARNER. The gold in the Treasury had been for many months gradually drifting away. Its place was being filled up with coined silver dollars. The last administration—and I speak now from the personal communication of the then Secretary of the Treasury, a man whose very able services to this country can not be too highly appreciated—the then Secretary of the Treasury told me that the most he hoped to be able to do was to carry the Government over the 4th of March upon the basis of gold payments.

I have reason to know when the present administration came into power its first and chiefest concern was to avoid the danger which had been predicted by the Republican Secretary in his official statement and in his private communications. The amount of gold in the Treasury on the 4th of March, 1885, was $126,000,000. This was a much smaller sum than had usually been held in the Treasury in gold since the resumption of specie payment. It was steadily running down. The public confidence was gone. The hoarding of gold had begun—not by the mass of the people, not in stockings, not in secret hiding places, but by the masters of finance, the men whose business it is to handle millions and to prevent their deterioration; they began to prepare for the hour of danger and the collapse which they thought was impending.

I know three of the greatest institutions in the city of New York—I shall not name them lest it might possibly bring down upon them the condemnation of those who are prejudiced against banks—but I know three institutions in the city of New York which had accumulated more than $25,000,000 of gold as a preparation for the collapse they thought was coming.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But which never came.

Mr. HEWITT. It did not; thanks to Grover Cleveland and that superb management of the Secretary of the Treasury which has made the name of Daniel Manning famous throughout the financial world.

The first effort made was to strengthen the Tresury in gold, but unfortunately it was at the season of the year when gold shipments usually take place. The effort was a failure. The gold gradually ran down until on the 30th of June it fell to $120,000,000. An effort had been made by the Republican Secretary of the Treasury, I mean by the Secretary of the Treasury of the last administration, I do not use the word "Republican" in any party sense—an effort had been made to avoid this state of things by paying out silver certificates in the city of Boston. The result had been to bring on a feeling of profound distrust, and it was abandoned. The Treasury thought finally they ought not seek to force silver certificates on the unwilling creditors of the Government. They pursued the policy which had been from the foundation of the Government, except during the era of suspension of specie payments, its crowning glory; that is, to pay the creditor of the Government in any funds he might desire, and that all the money of the Government should be interchangeable and of equal value. Now, this money is not of equal instrinsic value. Gold is the unit of value, not merely by the statutes of the United States, but by the fact that it is the medium of exchange and payment throughout the civilized world. Everything else measures itself in commerce, in international transactions, by gold.

The money of the United States in like manner, whatever may be its intrinsic value, is necessarily thus measured. It consists partly of gold which is the unit value by law. It consists partly of paper which has no intrinsic value, but which derives its value from the fact the people may take it to the Treasury and get gold for it. It consists partly of silver, the intrinsic value of which to-day is 74 cents on the dollar, but which, equally with the greenback, passes for 100 cents on the dollar because the Government has provided a practical redemption for it in its taxes and custom-house duties.

It was this parity of value that the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury determined to maintain at all hazards, and I have no doubt that if the emergency had arisen as mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois yesterday, making it necessary to sell United States bonds, in order to put gold in the Treasury, that drastic and final remedy would have been applied. But by the most careful management the contingency was avoided.

If any gentleman doubts whether it existed or not, but I suppose none do doubt it, a resolution adopted at the New York Clearing-House on the 20th of July, 1885, by the associated banks of the city of New York will certainly clear up any doubt on the subject. Tnis resolution contains the following:

NEW YORK CLEARING HOUSE,
New York, July 20, 1885.

At a meeting of the associated banks of this city, held on the 13th instant, the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Whereas, after careful inquiry into the current operations of the United States Treasury, it is ascertained that with the continued purchase of two million silver bullion per month the probable receipts of gold currency will be insufficient to meet the demands upon it until the meeting of Congress in December next, but that the Secretary will be compelled to make his payments in silver dollars, which will become a most disturbing element in the daily business of the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That to avert this threatened danger, and in the confident belief that Congress will take early steps to prevent the deterioration of the present commercial standard of value, the banks hereby tender to the Government, from their gold reserves, the sum of $10,000,000 in exchange for that amount in fractional silver coin, or for such other currency as the clearing-house committee may approve, the same to be apportioned among banks in the clearing house respectively, pro rata of their deposits and gold reserve.

Resolved, That should this amount prove insufficient, a further sum, not to exceed ten millions, be offered, and that the banks of Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and other cities be invited by the clearing-house committee to participate in carrying out the object of these resolutions.

The undersigned committee appointed under these resolutions respectfully invite your co-operation in securing the object in view. Since the resumption of coin payments on 1st January, 1879, the banks throughout the country, together with the Government itself, have practically maintained the gold standard then re-established, and the business of the nation has been carried on upon that basis in harmony with all the leading commercial nations of the world. The varied products of industry and the natural operations of its trade have since furnished this country with superabundant supplies of gold, so that the surplus money reserves held by all the banks now greatly exceed anything ever known in our history. With all these favorable financial conditions we are suddenly called upon to confront the fact that the resources of the Government have become unnaturally absorbed by the purchase of silver bullion converted into coined dollars of inferior value to such an extent as to constrain the officers of the Treasury to force them upon an unwilling people in payment for public dues, and these coins, or their representatives, now threaten to invade and poison all the channels of trade by being introduced as commercial equivalents into the clearing-houses of the country.

That is the recorded judgment of the best financial authorities of New York, and concurred in by bankers throughout the country.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HEWITT. I would rather not at this time, but will yield presently.

Mr. PAYSON. I was going to suggest that I wish the gentleman would follow the line of thought which he is now pursuing and state precisely what was done under that resolution.

Mr. HEWITT. I am going to do so; and if the gentleman will possess his soul in patience, and my voice holds out, I will give him that information in the course of my remarks.

Mr. PAYSON. I am one of the most patient men in the House.

Mr. HEWITT. I am aware of that, and I have no doubt that I have often tried your patience, and may try it again to-day.

These "financial men of New York" and their financial operations various gentlemen are in the habit of criticising severely. They are spoken of as persons without patriotism, and with no regard for the general interests of the country. These men of New York occupy the positions which they hold by the divinest right—the right which comes from possessing knowledge and ability. They are gathered into New York from every State in this Union. The best brain of the country goes to New York. It is the best market for brains. They come from every portion of the habitable globe. They come with their knowledge of resources of this and of other countries. They have been trained in the school of experience. They are rich because they have made themselves rich. New York has not made them rich. New York has no power to make any man rich. New York has made many a man poor; but it can make no man rich. It is simply the center of the exchanges, as it is the headquarters of the financial ability of this continent. When you are sick you send for a doctor; when you are in litigation you send for a lawyer; when you are going to build a railway you send for an engineer; but when you are going to administer the finances of a great country what do you do? Three hundred and twenty-five gentlemen, of whom certainly not more than ten would pretend to run a bank, who would quote against most of us, "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread"—three hundred and twenty-five gentlemen sit down here and take up the most difficult and the most complicated problems of finance, and instead of legislating upon general principles come down to specific details, as is done in this resolution, directing the Secretary of the Treasury how much money he must keep in the Treasury and how much money he must let out, without any possible comprehension of the tendencies of the future, the possibilities of business, or the demands of foreign capitalists upon the reserve which they have invested in this country.

I contend and always have contended that it is a perversion of the functions of the Treasury to possess the power to make money easy or to make it tight at its pleasure. But it is no fault of this administration nor of the last administration that it possesses that power. It was the result of that conflict which overwhelmed in a common destruction both North and South so far as the finances of the country were concerned. The United States Treasury, from being a fiscal machine, as it was before the war, has now become a great bank; it is a bank of issue, a bank of deposit; it is a member of the clearing-house. It could not disregard if it would the condition of the money market; because, suppose for a moment that the balance should run down in a time of great depression, when business was embarrassed; suppose it was necessary to re-enforce that balance in order to maintain the parity between the various kinds of money issued by the Treasury—suppose that should happen, where would the Government go to get its money? It would have either to go into the money centers and procure it by hypothecating, as this administration was compelled to do, a portion of its Treasury reserves in order to get gold, or else it would have to sell bonds in order to keep up the Treasury balances, either of which would withdraw from an already depleted money market an additional sum to be locked up in the Treasury, thereby increasing the stringency of the money market. The Government can not strengthen itself in a close money market. It must keep strong. The gentlemen who advocate this proposition are fair-weather sailors.

Since the resumption of specie payments we have had a long era of easy money; and it has been an easy task in the main to keep the Treasury in a strong condition. It would be an easy task now, too, but for the fact that $2,800,000 of silver are poured into it monthly, which in effect must drive $2,800,000 either in greenbacks or in gold out of the Treasury unless it is hoarded there.

Now I will tell the gentleman from Illinois who asked the question what was done with the proposition of the banks to which I referred. It would be unjust if I were to leave the House under the impression that this action of the banks was altogether without suggestion from some other quarter. No official application was made to them for help, but the situation was discussed and resulted in the offer on the part of the banks to furnish $10,000,000 and a further sum of ten millions if necessary. About six millions, or a little over six millions, was thus paid into the Treasury, when the balances began slowly to increase, because public confidence was restored by the action of the banks and the evidence it afforded that the banks were prepared to make common cause with the Treasury and maintain payments upon a gold basis. Since that time the Treasury balance has increased in gold to one hundred and fifty-six millions, and this has been accomplished by a change in the system of payments by the Treasury.

They have paid out greenbacks freely. They have paid out gold freely when it was asked for. The result was the greenbacks and the gold have flowed back into the Treasury through the channels of taxation. When the attempt was made to force the silver certificates upon the public the receipts of the Government began rapidly to increase in silver certificates, because people always pay away first that in which they have least confidence. But the normal condition of things has now been restored, and the Treasury is in a comfortable position, and calls on bonds have been resumed to the fullest extent that in the judgment of those charged with this responsibility the Treasury can afford to go without disturbing the relation of convertibility of every class of money issued by the Government into every other class of money upon the basis of gold as the unit of value at 25.8 grains to the standard dollar.

Now, it is proposed to limit this discretion which has been exercised since the resumption of specie payments by the Treasury Department, and which has been exercised since the 4th of March, 1885, by a Democratic administration in a manner which has elicited the warmest encomiums, the highest admiration from all financial authorities at home and abroad. I forbear for even one minute to consider the motives which may be behind this movement. But I wish to say, inasmuch as my colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] made the charge that it was a movement on the part of the Democratic leaders against the administration—I wish to say just this, in view of the record of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], that such a supposition is simply impossible. For years he and I have stood shoulder to shoulder to maintain gold payments as the basis of the money of the United States.

Year after year he has gone home to his constituents, and has raised aloft the banner of honest money in a region of country where the heresy of fiat money was most prevalent, and almost alone he has made a gallant fight, and I shall be the last man ever to allow an imputation to be made on him that he is deliberately planning the destruction of that policy for which he has made sacrifices and which owes to him as much as to any living man the fact that we are on a gold basis to-day. I can not account for his action now on any other theory than this: He has discovered that a "fiscal distemper" has broken out. [Laughter.] It was a sporadic case. But he had to pay attention to it and to study its symptoms. I am afraid that that sporadic case has become contagious, and all I can say of my friend from Illinois is, I account for his action on the ground that he has got the disease; but I predict that he will recover from it, for not to recover would be against the principles and practice of his life. [Laughter.]

I do not expect that the other gentleman who co-operated with him will recover. I expect he will die of the disease. I do not expect to go to his funeral. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I belong to a long-lived stock. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT. I will be under the sod long before you.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is merely an expectation born of hope.

Mr. HEWITT. As to the third member of the committee, the Speaker, his good nature is proverbial. I have no doubt when he found that the two wings of the Democratic party were flapping together for the first time this session he felt it was his duty to let them keep on flapping; and I suppose my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] when he referred to that fact had this matter in mind. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us suppose that this resolution is put into operation; what will happen? In about five months we shall be brought back, so far as the gold in the Treasury is concerned, to the condition in which we were on the 4th of March, 1885. That was a condition of great alarm and distrust. In another month we would be ten millions worse off. In another month we should be further down. In seven months we should be down to the one hundred million limit. What happened then will happen again. This is a question of experience and authority. People's ideas of what they think will happen or what they would like to have happen amount to nothing against the actual lessons of experience and authority. We tried this experiment as far as we could try it. We got down to a limit of one hundred and twenty-six millions. The gold was hoarded. When we get back there or begin to go back there on the passage of this resolution it will be hoarded again. The result must inevitably be that the gold coin—five hundred and fifty millions I believe it is estimated to be—I refer all these matters to my learned friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]—five hundred and fifty millions must disappear from circulation; I will not say from the country; but it must disappear from circulation the moment a premium, however small, is once established between gold and the other money of the country.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What effect will that have on the remaining volume of money?

Mr. HEWITT. The remaining volume of money will be reduced pro tanto.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In value?

Mr. HEWITT. No; in quantity. The result of a sudden withdrawal from the channels of trade of a large amount of currency in use means the stoppage of business, not the fall in value of the remaining money. No; that will come later. But it means the stoppage of business for the want of the lubricating material for the machinery of business, which is money. A hundred thousand men are to be employed by the adoption of this resolution; a million of men will lose their daily employment the moment the gold is withdrawn from circulation.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question which is pertinent to what he has just suggested. If the $550,000,000 of gold hides itself away, will there not be a pressure upon this House to supply its place with a cheap currency printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. BRUMM. That "cheap currency" is at 5 per cent. premium now in England.

Mr. HEWITT. I said, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], that the quantity of money would be reduced and that the wheels of business would be stopped; but in this country, governed by a people who have to earn their daily bread, the wheels of business will not be permitted to remain long idle, and, whatever may be the remedy—my friend from Illinois will tell us that it would be the restoration of gold (I differ with him)—but whatever may be the remedy that is required to set those wheels in motion it will be adopted, and we who have brought on this mischief, including believers in the gold basis, will be powerless to resist the demand which will come here for further issues of paper money, and I venture to predict the form in which those issues will first be made.

The greenbacks are maintained at par upon a reserve varying from 30 to 40 per cent. The reserve behind the silver certificates is to-day 74 per cent., a most wasteful and unnecessary reserve from a financial point of view. The first proposition that will be made, to which no financial authority will be able to make answer, will be: "If 35 or 40 per cent. is a sufficient reserve, let us double up the silver certificates upon the fund which is now in the Treasury." That will be the first step. The next step will be a demand for more greenbacks—not the greenback that saved the life of the nation, but a new kind of greenback to save the business and the industries of the nation. And, under the decision of the Supreme Court, I know of no answer which can be made by this House or by Congress in denial of that demand. Of the evils of such a state of things it is not necessary for me to speak. We go back to the basis of inconvertible paper money.

We deliberately adopt fiat money as the end of all this long struggle for a sound currency, and that, too, notwithstanding the pledge of the Democratic party that "we believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss." That process is one which robs those who have accumulated property and who have loaned it out to borrowers of a portion of their property—how large a proportion I know not; but during the period when we were under suspension it robbed them at one time of 60 per cent. It results in the transfer of the property of the country from the hands of those who have earned it and saved it into the pockets of the rich, the speculators, the masters of finance, many of them, most of them, perhaps, residing in my own city and many of them in my own district.

I do not want to pile up these overgrown fortunes at the expense of the industry and the labor of the country. I do not wish to rob the widow and the orphan who have their savings deposited in savings-banks. I do not wish to take away from the man who has provided a life-insurance fund for his family half of what he supposed he had secured to them. Of course when we have passed through the valley of the shadow of death which once we traveled with tears and lamentations, made wiser by suffering, taught by bitter experience, we shall slowly retrace our steps to the basis of honest money, the money which the Democratic party from the time of Jefferson and Gallatin to the present day have insisted is the only money for the people. The best money, the money which measures all other money in all other parts of the world, gold, is not too good for the workingman, is not too good for the widow and the orphan, is not too good for the pensioner, is not too good for the citizen who wishes that justice shall be established and maintained in this land forever.

It is for this that the President has made this struggle. It is to fulfill his obligation to the party that put him in power; it is to comply with his oath to support the Constitution, which alone permits the coinage of gold and silver; it is for this that he has resisted all pressure from all quarters to call bonds at a time when, as he has told us in his annual message, the calls would have compelled the two metals to part company. The policy of the administration is to keep gold and silver married, for better, for worse, one as good as the other, neither the better-half of the other; but when the time comes that the choice must be made between them, the President of the United States will adhere, as he has promised and sworn to do, to that standard of value which pays debts in the value intended at the time the debts were contracted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be said, in fact it has been said, that this is all very well to talk about, but that it will not happen. Sir, I am no prophet; I am not the son of a prophet; I am only a humble student of history and finance, trained in business, often brought face to face with questions of this kind, and therefore I can only bring to the House the measure of my own experience and knowledge, supplemented, however, by the knowledge and experience of those who are confessed to be the masters of the question. A hundred millions of dollars will, if this resolution be adopted, be the sole reserve for the redemption of the paper money of the United States. How much is there of this paper money? Three hundred and forty-six millions of greenbacks and three hundred and eleven millions of national-bank notes, making in round numbers $650,000,000, upon which $100,000,000 of reserve is about 15 per cent.

To this is to be added the whole volume of silver money, now amounting to $234,000,000, and increasing at the rate of $3,000,000 per month, for the reason that not being of the instrinsic value of gold its parity can only be maintained by redemption out of the reserve fund.

That is your reserve. Let us see what we provided when we began to resume specie payments. When resumption took place there were $246,000,000 in the Treasury. We were told triumphantly yesterday that only $12,000 of greenbacks came in for redemption. Of course the quantity of notes coming in for redemption was inconsiderable, for the Treasury held gold enough to pay upon demand two-thirds of the entire amount outstanding. After the public had become accustomed to specie payments the gold balance in the Treasury was suffered slowly to run down until the average amount of gold in the Treasury varied from year to year between $140,000,000 and $150,000,000 free and clear of all demands.

Now remember this is fair weather. I do not hesitate to say that in a stormy time $140,000,000 or $150,000,000 is not a sufficient sum of itself to insure convertibility into gold for both the national-bank notes and the greenbacks. But in fair weather it is abundant. The effect of this resolution will be to bring on foul weather—a storm. Instead of being stronger, we are weaker; instead of having furled our sails in advance, they are all spread to the wind, and the ship, rolling and tossing, will finally go down under the overpowering volume—I was going to say of wind, but currency when inflated and wind are correlative terms, and therefore I may say of currency which will be poured in for redemption.

I know the Government holds security in bonds for the national-bank notes. I know that the banks can redeem their notes in greenbacks. What will happen if the Government calls in its bonds and the national banks deposit greenbacks to cover their outstanding circulation? The greenbacks will be withdrawn from circulation; and then the difficulties of business will be increased tenfold, unless the Treasury does what I think it has no moral right to do, although it may have the legal right—unless it uses the trust fund deposited by the banks for the redemption of their currency and pays it out into the community, so that not only the national-bank notes but the greenbacks will be in circulation. But if the demand be for gold (and for gold it will be), the fact that both forms of currency are outstanding and the Government is then responsible for both will only increase the rush upon the Treasury for gold and soonerbring about collapse.

What do other countries do? The gentleman from Ohio gave us the facts and has spared me the necessity of repeating them. In England, with bank notes to the amount of £24,000,000 in circulation, and including those of the private banks—about £30,000,000 ($150,000,000)—the Bank of England never lets her specie get below £18,000,000. When that point is reached she raises the rate of interest, and, as she has done within the last sixty days, restores the balance, until it is now over £20,000,000. In other words, with $150,000,000 in circulation, the bank is sure to keep $100,000,000 in hand ready to meet her notes, the reserve thus being 66⅔ per cent.

But the gentleman from Ohio will tell us that this is a reserve to meet other obligations. So it is; but at the very worst period we have seen in the last twenty years the reserve of the Bank of England was 35½ per cent. in specie for every dollar of circulation and every dollar of deposits in her possession.

That is her practice. What is the practice of the Bank of France? To-day the Bank of France holds in round numbers over 90 per cent. of gold and silver in her vaults against the paper currency which is outstanding; and the Bank of France has behind her in addition the Government of France. More than that, she has in circulation among her people the largest fund of gold and silver that exists in any nation of the world. Yet the gold and silver which the Bank of France keeps on hand is 90 per cent. of her paper money. The same thing substantially is true of the other great banking institutions—for instance, the Imperial Bank of Germany, though there the circumstances are somewhat different. But human experience has never contemplated the maintenance of specie payments in time of trouble upon a basis below 35 or 40 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HEWITT. I had no idea that I should or could occupy my hour. I fear I have exhausted the patience of the House, as I have myself.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. HEWITT. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New Jersey, but I think I have sufficiently brought out the views which I entertain and which led me to make the minority report, standing alone among the Democrats on the committee. I shall, if there be no objection, attach that minority report to these remarks in further explanation of my views. [Applause.]

I dissent from the report of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means in favor of the following joint resolution directing the payment of the surplus in the Treasury in excess of $100,000,000 on the public debt:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That whenever the surplus or balance in the Treasury, including amount held for redemption of United States notes, shall exceed the sum of $100,000,000, it shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to apply such excess, in sums not less than ten millions per month during the existence of any such surplus or excess, to the payment of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States payable at the option of the Government."

The effect of this resolution, if enacted into law, will be to reduce the balance in the Treasury available for the payment of its current indebtedness and for the redemption of the legal-tender notes to $100,000,000. It makes no provision for replenishing the Treasury when the available balance shall fall below $100,000,000. The question thus presented is whether, in view of the obligations and the functions of the Treasury as now defined by law, the proposed limitation upon the balance to be held for meeting the liabilities payable on demand is prudent and safe, with a due regard to the solemn pledge of the United States to redeem all its indebtedness in coin or its equivalent. The undersigned believe that such a limitation would be unwise, dangerous, and at variance with the experience alike of solvent nations and of sound financial institutions.

The ordinary disbursements of the Treasury may be roughly stated to amount to about $1,000,000 per day. To meet these disbursements it is necessary that a reasonable working balance should be kept on hand, because at times the current expenditures largely exceed the daily receipts. Careful business firms usually carry a balance equal to one month's disbursements. Measured by this standard, and a lower one can not be safely adopted, because the Secretary of the Treasury has no power to make temporary loans, the working balance in the Treasury should be about $30,000,000. That this amount is not too large will be apparent from the fact that in the Pension Bureau alone drafts for $10,000,000 will be made on the 1st of March, and that the amount of future payments, under the arrears act, can not be definitely fixed for any specified date.

But, besides the current expenditures provided for by law, the United States has a totally distinct obligation to provide for a debt payable on demand in the shape of $346,681,016 of legal-tender notes. These notes form about one-half of the paper currency of the country. They constitute the final means of payment between individuals and of settlement in all the transactions of business. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, that the ability to redeem these notes in coin shall be at all times assured beyond preadventure. For this purpose there must always be retained in the Treasury a reasonable and adequate reserve of coin. The only question is as to the amount of coin which will constitute a reasonable and adequate reserve.

To determine this point we have no other guide but usage and experience. In the case of gold and silver certificates the Treasury keeps dollar for dollar, but in the case of the legal-tender notes it has not been usual to have at any time in the Treasury a reserve in coin exceeding one-half of the whole issue of such notes. When specie payments were resumed bonds of the United States were sold so as to provide a fund amounting to $95,500,000 in gold for the purpose of assuring the redemption of the notes, which, as the law then provided, were to be reduced by cancellation to $300,000,000. It was certainly not considered safe to begin resumption with less than one-third reserve, and as a matter of fact, the available balance in the Treasury amounted to over 40 per cent.

At the present time, under the practice of the Treasury, claimed to be in accordance with the bank act of 1882, $100,000,000 in gold coin is set apart for the redemption of the legal-tender notes, being rather less than 29 per cent. This reserve would be regarded by prudent bankers as a minimum amount in an easy money market, but if the financial prospects should be threatening, prudence would require that it should be enlarged and strengthened. The practice of the Treasury, under Secretary Sherman, who put the resumption act in operation, was not to allow the reserve to fall below 40 per cent., and, all things considered, this is probably the smallest amount consistent with absolute safety. If this ratio be adopted, the amount of the reserve in coin would be $138,000,000. Adding this amount to the amount heretofore stated as a reasonable working balance, we have the sum of $168,000,000 as the minimum balance which the Treasury should carry in order to be in a condition of ease and safety. Any other conclusion is at variance with lessons of experience and the well-established rules for the safe conduct of business.

The main argument urged for infringing on this balance must be the saving in interest on $68,000,000, which, after allowing for the tax on bank circulation, is 2½ per cent. per annum, amounting to $1,700,000 annually. But it is to be remembered that the demand debt of the United States, represented by the legal-tender notes, bears no interest, and that the gain in interest between the total amount and a proper reserve is over $4,000,000 per annum, so that the Government can well afford the outlay required to keep its finances in the strongest possible position, and should certainly never approach the point where, under the law, it might become necessary to sell United States bonds in order to preserve specie payments. Such a contingency would not be an edifying spectacle to a people whose proud boast it is that in twenty years from the close of the war it has paid off more than one-half the public debt and reduced the burden of interest to one-third of its original amount. Certainly a policy so humiliating would be condemned by the people when its effects shall become apparent.

In all measures affecting the currency of the country the greatest care must be taken not to interfere with its flexibility. This essential attribute of a safe currency must reside somewhere, its exact depository depending upon the system of banking in operation. Under our system of national banks, in which the issue of notes is limited to 90 per cent. of the bonded debt deposited to secure the circulation, the only flexible agency resides in the Treasury, by virtue of the power now exercised by the Secretary to make calls for the redemption of the public debt. It is a grave question whether such power should ever be intrusted to the Government or to the discretion of any official. In other conservative commercial countries it has been conferred upon intermediate agencies in direct communication with the business interests of the people. We have no such system, and hence the Treasury has been forced to become a member of the New York Clearing-House, which is the financial center of the exchanges of the country. The Treasury is thus practically engaged in the banking business, not only in the issue of currency, but in adapting its operations to the general requirements of trade.

Dangerous as this system is, it was the outgrowth of necessity, and until some other security beside the bonded debt of the United States is devised for the issue of bank currency, the power to come to the relief of the money market in times of stringency must reside in the Treasury. The remedy is not to destroy or impair the only flexible element of the existing system in the calls of bonds, but to divorce the Government altogether from the banking business, and bring it back to its ancient and only legitimate function of collecting its revenues in lawful money and of making its disbursements out of the money thus collected in accordance with law. This result can only be reached by the payment of the demand notes of the United States, and substituting, through the national banks or some other fiscal agency, an issue of currency subject to adequate taxation, properly secured and automatic in its expansion and contraction, the redemption of which will belong to the agency of issue and not to the Government, whose only function will then be to see that the security is sufficient and the general administration is carried on in accordance with the well-settled principles of safe banking.

One other consideration may be presented as a fatal argument against the reduction of the Treasury balance to $100,000,000 in coin necessary at all times to be kept for the redemption of the legal-tender notes. The ability of speculators to reduce this balance below $100,000,000 by presenting demand notes for payment is obvious, and unless the expedient for replacing the amount by the sale of bonds be resorted to, the money market could be so manipulated as to impair confidence and bring about a general disaster, by which the operators for a fall would reap abundant profits at the expense of the legitimate business of the country. Within a very recent period, when the Treasury was plethoric with money, but with an impaired gold balance, all the indications pointed to a great disturbance to be effected by the hoarding or exportation of gold. Very strenuous efforts and decided measures were required to prevent the catastrophe, which at any time may occur when the danger-line is passed in the reduction of the gold balance below the minimum reserve originally provided for the resumption of specie payments.

Being clearly of opinion that the proposed resolution will neither be economical, so far as the Government is concerned, nor advantageous to the business interests of the country, but in fact extremely dangerous in times of recurring strengency in the money market, I recommend that it be laid upon the table.

ABRAM S. HEWITT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 13, 1886.

SIR: I have received a copy of the following proposed joint resolution respecting surplus revenue, now under consideration in your committee, and upon which you do me the honor to request my opinion:

"Joint resolution directing the payment of the surplus in the Treasury in excess of $100,000,000 on the public debt.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the surplus or balance in the Treasury, including amount held for redemption of United States notes, shall exceed the sum of $100,000,000, it shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to apply such excess, in sums not less than $10,000,000 per month during the existence of any such surplus or excess, to the payment of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States payable at the option of the Government."

The language of this resolution is such as to include in the "surplus or balance in the Treasury" the amount held for redemption of United States notes. This is in no sense a surplus, but is set apart and appropriated as a minimum security and reserve for the redemption and payment of $346,681,016 of United States notes which have been issued, both of which are specifically promised in the act of March 18, 1869 (R. S. 3693). This reserve, amounting to $100,000,000, should of course be held above all possibility of an encroachment, like that which my distinguished predecessor, Mr. McCulloch, in his last annual report (page 33), was constrained to exhibit and deplore.

The resolution now before me requires that there should be at no time a surplus in the Treasury available for the general needs of the Government to exceed $10,000,000, and that when this sum is reached it should be immediately paid upon the public debt.

After nearly twelve months' experience in the conduct of this Department, and forecasting, as well as I am able, future requirements of the Treasury, as now defined by existing laws, and as they may be affected by legislation yet to come, and considering the course of future receipts, which are liable to influence from many causes, such as the fluctuation of imports, the prolonged depression of trade, and the marketing of more or less of our agricultural products abroad, I can not now foresee a state of things which will make it prudent to limit the surplus reserve in the Treasury to a sum ranging from nothing to a maximum of $10,000,000.

The legislation now before Congress relating to pensions will, if perfected, increase the demands upon the Treasury to an amount which it is impossible to exactly estimate; and a late decision of the Supreme Court subjects the Government to the repayment of duties collected, the aggregate of which is large but altogether indefinite. These things are mentioned to remind the committee that neither the calls upon the Treasury nor the exact time that such demands must be met can be precisely foreseen.

It would seem to follow, as a business proposition, that if the Government is to maintain its credit, in the sense of being prepared to meet all just demands, which are impossible of ascertainment in advance, there should be a reasonable sum laid by or kept on hand for that purpose.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, obtained the floor, and said: I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the pending joint resolution will, if it becomes a law, require the Secretary from time to time to disburse monthly in payment of the interest-bearing public debt subject to call all surplus money in the Treasury in excess of $100,000,000. However this disbursement, the resolution provides, must be in sums not less that $10,000,000 per month.

It may be presumptuous, as indicated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who has just taken his seat, for a man who does not reside in New York to have any opinion on this question. I notice, sir, that New York is rarely divided on these questions. They have no politics. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], a Republican, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], a Democrat, join hands in declaring here that this House is incompetent to decide a question of this character, and that we shoulddefer to their judgment, and to the judgment of New York.

Mr. Chairman, it is hard for us common people to see that, and we shall have to discuss it for a few minutes anyhow. [Laughter.]

Now, what is the present surplus in excess of the so-called $100,000,000 of greenback-redemption fund? I have before me the Treasurer's statement of June 30, 1886, which gives the balance at $104,473,605.61. To this should be added in all fairness $24,471,955.38, consisting of items belonging to the "Post-Office Department account" and "disbursing officers' balances," which the Treasurer has improperly deducted from his estimate of cash balance on hand. These items are not demand liabilities. The revenues are constantly coming in to replenish and replace these items.

This then swells the net cash balance to the grand total of $128,844,560.99, over and above the $100,000,000 of coin held for what is improperly called the redemption of the greenbacks. It includes, however, in round numbers, $28,000,000 in subsidiary silver and minor coins.

I do not mean to concede that under an ingenious system of bookkeeping and Treasury management that the sum here indicated is the sum total of money that might be properly and immediately disbursed with perfect safety to our credit and in perfect accord with sound business principles, for I believe that we could safely pay out twice that sum and then have money to spare. I do not wish to be misunderstood upon this matter by any means.

Under present conditions of law, growth of population, and of our current receipts and expenditures this surplus is likely to remain an ever-increasing quantity. That there should be any doubt about the propriety of restoring this enormous surplus to the channels of trade by paying it out on an equal amount of matured interest-bearing and hence burdensome public debt seems to me like a travesty upon common sense and business propriety. And when we consider the present ample authority of law for such disbursement, the bare necessity of a resolution like the one under consideration marks I fear an alarming decline in that high sense of official responsibility and obedience to law that characterized the early officers of the Republic.

What moral or legal right has a Secretary of the Treasury to horde in the vaults millions, yea hundreds of millions, of money that has been drawn from the people by painful taxation when interest-bearing debts are due and payable according to law? Why, sir—and I wish to be entirely impersonal—to the extent of the additional interest which the people are thus forced to pay by such a policy, and to the extent of the injury inflicted by withholding this money from the channels of business, I hesitate not to say that, pro tanto, it amounts morally to a misappropriation of the public funds and to the baldest kind of absolute tyranny.

What do gentlemen mean by opposing this resolution? Is it not mild and conservative enough in all conscience? The only trouble with it in my opinion is that it does not go far enough. It simply says in effect: "Come, let us set apart $100,000,000 for any emergency that may arise, and then pay out the balance on our debts." Now, taking our industrial depression and the pressing wants of trade into account, I ask could there be a more conservative proposition made? And yet, gentlemen here who represent the great money centers of the country oppose it with that solemnity of utterance, gravity of mien, and dejection of spirit that reminds one of the lamentations of Jeremiah over the follies of Israel or of David weeping over the profligacy and rebellion of his son Absalom.

While the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] was speaking, the lachrymal barometer indicated a heavy fall of tears, and while his colleague [Mr. HEWITT] was on the floor we were threatened with a perfect water-spout, washout, and wreck. [Laughter.] Why, says the first gentleman [Mr. HISCOCK], this is bad faith. It is an attempt to pay the debt in cheap silver dollars of less value than the coin you received for the bonds, and therefore it is rank repudiation. What respectable drivel! Coin received for the bonds!

Now, inasmuch as the question of repudiation is raised, let us see who it is that is seeking to repudiate the contract nominated in the bond. Let us be sure that we get the boot on the right leg. During the war the Government issued a large amount of bonds, bearing coin interest, and exchanged them for circulating Treasury notes. These notes were received in exchange for bonds at par, although they were purchased in the market with gold at less than 50 cents on the dollar. By express terms these bonds were payable in lawful money, and every greenback in the pockets of the people was labeled with the declaration that it was receivable for all public and private dues except interest on the public debt and duties on imports.

The soldier had a coin contract for his wages, and yet the Government paid him in this depreciated paper. It was submitted to without a murmur, and through valor and suffering the war closed and the value of Government bonds began to increase in the market, and in 1869 they reached a premium. At this period, under a false pretense, what is known as the credit-strengthening act was passed. It should have been styled an act to strengthen the public creditor instead of the public credit. This converted their currency bonds into coin obligations. Not satisfied with this and fearing a repeal at the hands of an indignant people, the funding act of July 14, 1870, was passed. This act was very explicit and specific in its terms. The currency bonds were to be refunded into coin bonds and were to be paid in coin of the weight and fineness of that date, July 14, 1870. There was no foolishness about that act. The coin had to be bright, unworn, and exactly so fine. Everything was now fixed and made certain.

So matters have continued in this condition up to the present time. These bonds have shirked all the burdens of taxation for nearly a quarter of a century. The interest has been paid quarterly in gold coin, aggregating a total of $2,370,000,000 in interest alone. During all this time the holders of these bonds have been banking on them and have received from the Government an average of about $300,000,000 per annum in bank notes at a nominal tax or cost of only 1 per cent. per annum, payable half yearly. They have loaned these notes out at high rates and taken the interest in advance on every loan. They have been permitted to draw their interest on their bonds in advance in many instances without rebate. They have been made the depositories of public funds, and have loaned these funds out at usury and pocketed the proceeds.

And now our Treasury is bursting with lawful money, every dollar of which, whether gold, silver, or greenbacks, is of equal value with every other dollar, and will at this moment purchase more of the necessaries of life than it would when the funding act was passed sixteen years ago to-day—July 14, 1870. The Government says to its creditors, "You hold our paper and it is due and payable. The money is ready for you; hold out your hand and receive it." The answer comes, "In what kind of money are you going to pay us?" We reply, "In the money of the contract—in coin of the standard weight and fineness of July 14, 1870." "But," say they, "we do not want coin of the standard weight and fineness of July 14, 1870, unless it is gold coin. If you pay us in silver coin, the bullion in it must be of equal value with the gold dollar of 1886."

Now the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and every member of this House knows that we have never agreed to do any such thing as that, and we never will. Who are the repudiators, the people who wish to pay exactly according to contract, or they who stand at the Treasury doors higgling for still harder terms and an overthrow of the equities of the former agreement? How cruel and devoid of mercy is such a position! It is enough to make the cheek tingle with mingled feelings of shame and indignation. How these men can face the poor wage-earners whose average earnings are only about $300 per annum; how they can face the soldiers of the Republic who were paid in depreciated paper, and have been paying for a quarter of a century their own taxes and the bondholders' too, is beyond all comprehension.

But I must not digress too far when I am so limited for time. Now what is likely to be the effect of this resolution, and of what value will it be to the country? It will not, in my judgment, materially reduce the surplus, for the reason that there will only be paid out under it $10,000,000 per month, and with our present current receipts the surplus will continue to increase at a rate per month nearly equal to the disbursement required if this resolution becomes a law. What good will it accomplish then? Why, this: It directs the payment of the public debt and establishes that as our policy. This, of course, will undermine the national banks and direct public attention to the great question of what shall be the permanent currency of the Republic.

The payment of these 3 per cent. bonds will be followed by contraction of national-bank circulation, but not to an extent greater than the amount paid out on the bonds. There will be a saving of the interest which we are now paying on the 3 percents. I shall vote for the resolution, but I wish to amend it so as to define what is meant by "surplus or balance," and also so as to require the disbursement of all surplus money in the Treasury in excess of $50,000,000. I think this is enough and more than is needed as a working balance and to satisfy the hallucination that possibly some one may want at some future time to present a few greenbacks to be exchanged for coin.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great respect and close attention throughout the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] for the purpose of discovering whether there was apparent cause for the dark cloud of prophecy which he has pictured heretofore and again in connection with the proposed legislation and whether his apprehension had any substantial basis. I say to that gentleman that I do not find, according to the mode of financial figuring which I secured from the common arithmetic rather than from experience in the management of public affairs, anything that justifies the dangers and the disasters he prophesies from the passage of this resolution.

This is not a silver question. It is a question as to whether we have the money in the Treasury undisposed of, and against which there are no legitimate claims, to the extent of seventy millions of dollars, so that that amount of money can be used in the manner suggested in the resolution in liquidation of that much of the interest-bearing debt of the Government. We propose in this resolution to do just what has been done in the past, when in pursuance of substantially the same principle and practice we reduced the public debt $1,200,000,000. Nay, more, we say, as the forty-four and one-half millions of dollars added to the sinking fund during the last fiscal year was managed so shall this seventy millions be managed; and I suggest that in the liquidation of the forty-four and one-half millions of bonds carried to the sinking fund during that period there never was a dollar of gold employed, and there was only about thirteen millions of United States notes used in the liquidation of that amount of debt.

I do not hesitate, Mr. Chairman, to say to-day that if this proposition prevails the amount of United States notes now in the Treasury is entirely adequate for the liquidation of the entire amount, as authorized to be paid by the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PAYSON. Do not the Treasury officials make that announcement?

Mr. RANDALL. I will tell you what their figures show: That there are $57,000,000 of gold there in excess of the $100,000,000 held there for the redemption of the United States notes outstanding. There are $22,000,000 there of United States notes, and $14,000,000 of other money in public depositories belonging to the Government of the United States, making in the aggregate about ninety-three millions of money in the possession of the Government, against which there is in fact no claim. I do not want any gentleman to confuse this question with the apprehension which prevails in the mind of the gentleman from New York. This is a mere matter of business management. We have unemployed in the Treasury of the United States, as I have shown, approaching ninety-three millions of money; and we say that to the extent of $70,000,000 it ought to be used in the liquidation of the public debt, just as we have liquidated $1,200,000,000 of the public debt heretofore, which has commanded the wonder and admiration of every civilized nation.

I assert, without questioning anybody's motives, that if these bonds that are due and payable at the option of the Government, to wit, about one hundred and thirty-five millions, one hundred millions of which are held by the Government as security for the national-bank circulation, were held by individual capitalists we would not hear any complaint against the proposition. [Applause.] It is because it bears upon the national banks to the extent of one hundred million of 3 percents that we hear this outcry, which is the mainspring of the hostility to the measure.

I say also that I know of no better way for a government to strengthen its credit than by paying its interest-bearing bonds. That is the way we have done in the past. If you want to strengthen still further the public credit, I do not object, nor do I find in this proposition introduced by the gentleman from Illinois objection that the one hundred millions shall be held as a redeeming fund toward the three hundred and forty-six millions of United States notes in circulation. If the Treasury officials should have an apprehension in connection with the large amount that we propose to liquidate by this proposition of the public indebtedness in addition to the forty-odd millions due during the current year as a payment to the sinking fund, then attach a limitation to the amount to be used.

There is that amount of money. The statement of the gentleman from Ohio immediately in front of me [General WARNER] to that effect has not been controverted, nor can it be. It can not be claimed that the money is not there, for the Treasury report shows that it is there; and all we ask is that that amount of money shall be used in the liquidation of the public indebtedness. That is what any business man would do. That is like to what the Government has done. And why all this scare at this time (after having paid more than a thousand millions of the public debt, just as is proposed in this joint resolution) when we suggest the propriety of paying seventy millions more? There is nothing in it, gentlemen. The truth is, the Government of the United States has the money, and can pay this amount as provided for with the use of less than the amount of United States notes that are to-day in the Treasury of the United States; because experience has shown in the case of the forty-four and a half millions paid to the sinking fund that it only required some thirteen millions to handle that amount of payment.

A like amount of United States notes, as I am informed, find their way back into the Treasury generally within ten days. The silver certificates come back, as I am advised, in large quantities within six days. I feel assured that within thirty days there would be returned to the Treasury of the United States through the receipts from customs, which are paid to-day to the extent of about 82½ per cent. in United States, notes, a sufficient sum to enable the Government to handle every payment of ten millions a month, just as they had handled the prior ten million payment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. MORRISON. I object to any extension of time for that purpose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. Speaker, my views are not in harmony with those thus far expressed on this side of the House. I am in favor of the resolution and heartily support it.

The criticism I make upon it is, that it does not, in my judgment go far enough; but as it is a step, or rather a stride, in the right direction I favor its adoption.

Let us see exactly what is proposed; for the observations thus far submitted seem to be based on the assumption that the whole question of the currency—finance and banking—is involved.

The resolution, as presented and amended by the chairman of the Ways and Means, is as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 126) directing payment of the surplus in the Treasury on the public debt.

Resolved, &c., That whenever the surplus or balance in the Treasury, including amount held for redemption of United States notes, shall exceed the sum of $100,000,000, it shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to apply such excess, in sums not less than ten millions per month, during the existence of any such surplus or excess, to the payment of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States payable at the option of the Government.

The surplus or balance herein referred to shall be the available surplus ascertained according to the form of statement of the United States Treasurer of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury of the United States employed on June 30, 1886.

This resolution has been offered upon the showing made by the Secretary of the Treasury as to its condition, in connection with the condition of the public debt.

There are outstanding and subject to call and payment, in round numbers, one hundred and forty-four millions of the bonds of the Government, drawing 3 per cent annual interest.

The assets and liabilities of the Treasury appear in the last official monthly statement, June 30, ultimo, as follows:

Statement showing the assets and liabilities of the Treasury from the latest returns received from the several assistant treasurers, mints, and assay offices of the United States, and national-bank depositories.

The call of bonds maturing July 1, was only $4,000,000, and the resolution contemplates the use of this surplus of $75,000,000 in the reduction of the interest-bearing debt. As against this proposal are found the gentlemen who assume that all the financial wisdom of the country is found in Wall street, and that no measures of a financial character should be passed except such as meet their interested approval.

Nor have the people forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that in all the years of the recent past, during and since the war, that every success we have had in our vast national financial experience has been against the advice and contrary to the predictions of all these professional financiers of their day.

We have had always the same direful predictions and lugubrious forebodings over results, but we have never seen one realized—not one—hence their advice and judgments do not inspire me with special confidence.

In the pending question the different monetary theories are not in the least degree involved. The cry that if this resolution is passed all payments must be made on Government account in silver or on the "silver basis," is without reason and puerile.

Past experience in the payment of the called bonds by Republican administrations, as well as the small reduction in the interest-bearing debt made by this, shows that under the modern system of exchanges the handling of vast sums at the commercial centers through the banks, clearing-houses, and the subtreasuries, a comparatively small sum of legal-tenders and gold certificates effects the redemptions and makes the payments.

Indeed, sir, I have been advised, in company with several of the distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, by a Treasury official who is authority, that if this resolution should pass, $15,000,000 in Treasury notes will practically make operative its provisions.

That, sir, disposes of the claim that all the gold will be withdrawn and the "silver basis" inaugurated.

I insist, sir, that there are involved in this proposal only the application of a few well-established and universally conceded business principles.

The nation is a rich debtor, rich and prosperous, its resources are in a state of infant development, its revenues so great and yet the burden so light that statesmanship is exercised to devise means of lessening them without clashing with existing interests.

The Treasury is literally overflowing with money; almost one-third the entire circulation of the country (which is a little in excess, in round numbers, of $1,500,000,000) is in the Treasury; confessedly there are one hundred and seventy-five millions for which there is no actual use, and which will not and can not be used except in the payment of the debt of the country bearing interest, or in the redemption of such of the Treasury notes as shall be presented.

Every obligation of the Government due on demand, or at its option, is at par; all deferred obligations, at a premium. A substantial portion of it, one hundred and forty millions, is due, drawing an annual interest of $4,200,000, and why do not we pay it?

Mr. Speaker, interest charges are always a burden; always the rule is inexorable; they never cease their accumulation; they retain their vigor and "flourish in immortal youth." Taxation to pay them is equally weighty, and when we have the money and can pay and stop interest and have no other profitable use for it, it is stupid folly not to do it; that is the plain English for it.

The tables I have read show what we have, and it should be so applied. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has given us an elaborate, carefully prepared and deliberately read speech in opposition to the resolution and the first one in the debate. Coming from this side of the House and from one of the most distinguished of our party, it may be regarded as a key-note to the views of this side. However that may be, I decline to enlist or march under the banner.

I do not believe in the doctrine he asserts. I do not believe in his conclusions. My views are my own; and believing them to be in harmony with my constituents, the people of the district who honor me with this seat, I do not hesitate to avow them and vote accordingly.

He speaks of the "sacredness of the funds specifically set apart for all these purposes," that these funds in the Treasury are "trust funds for specific purposes," &c., and further commits himself to the self-evident error of asserting that not only are the obligations issued by the Government payable in gold alone, but that the national-bank notes of the banks which have failed, or are in liquidation, or reducing circulation, are payable in gold.

The gentleman will excuse me from joining the procession.

He congratulates the administration that it has followed Republican precedent in the payment of the debt. Sir, here he is mistaken; this administration has not followed Republican precedent.

Until Mr. McCulloch was made Secretary of the Treasury in the closing hours of President Arthur's administration, we had adopted and followed the policy of calling an average of about ten millions of bonds per month. That was followed till he became Secretary of the Treasury for the very short time.

On the 4th of March, 1885, the Republican administration had in the Treasury:

Gold coin and bullion	$240,501,132 29
Less certificates outstanding	114,143,140 00
		$126,358,042 29
Silver coin and bullion	157,914,956 10
Less certificates outstanding	111,694,881 00
		46,220,075 10
Legal-tender notes	47,980,004 33
Less certificates outstanding	29,400,000 00
		18,580,004 33
Deposits in national banks		10,150,036 90
National-bank notes		9,355,462 53
		210,663,621 15
Liabilities of the Treasury upon the same date:
Matured debt and interest	$5,483,735 37
Interest due and unpaid	3,136,940 68
Accrued interest to date	6,529,435 37
Disbursing officers' balances	26,123,546 05
Outstanding drafts and checks	6,249,573 07
National-bank redemption fund	51,331,161 04
Post-Office Department	3,034,639 51
Legal tender reserve	100,000,000 00
		201,899,031 04
Net available balance in Treasury		8,764,590 11

Leaving an available surplus of only $8,764,590.

With that condition of the Treasury we were paying ten million per month of bonds, except, as I have said, during the short time Mr. McCulloch was Secretary. His views on the question of the greenback and the payment of the debt are too well known to be reproduced here.

This administration came in March 4, 1885. It had on that date one hundred and twenty-six millions in gold—it has never had less than one hundred and twenty millions in gold surplus—that was June 30, 1885 besides a large surplus of other available funds, and yet, sir, it never issued a call for bonds till December, 1885, and that not effective till February 1, 1886, for $10,000,000.

This, sir, in the face of a public sentiment expressed in every possible way. No call has it made for more than ten millions, and the last was but for four.

Fifty-eight millions, including the July redemption, all told, are all that have been called in the sixteen months; and we, sir, in the same time, called one hundred and fifty-three millions every sixteen months during the whole of the last Republican administration. That was the average. They do not follow our example, and hence the necessity of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment one of the gravest faults of our administration was that it did not reduce the debt as rapidly as it ought with the avails it had at hand. I felt and said so then, and emphasize it now. This administration is far worse.

The efforts of the present officials seem to be directed toward reducing the non-interest outstanding paper, as this résumé will show:

Reduction for the year ending June 30, 1886:
Bonded debt	$50,136,850
Certificates of deposit	11,330,000
Gold certificates	50,685,355
Silver certificates	13,414,721

This shows, sir, the principle upon which the Treasury Department is being run.

The gold and silver certificates are regarded with special favor by the people; they want, they demand that the interest-bearing debt shall be reduced; and yet these officials devote their energy to taking in and keeping in this favorite form of currency, and parade the figures, vast as they are, as so much reduction of the public debt.

The debt that the people want reduced is the debt that is a burden, that bears interest, that exhausts their resources to sustain, and not the one that is not only not burdensome but self-sustaining, and which is to all intents and purposes money, aiding in lightening the pressure of hard times.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it must be kept in mind that the available balance has been increased during the year $34,514,179, and the available gold increased by this administration in round numbers $69,000,000.

This is called by both the gentlemen from New York [Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. HEWITT] "strengthening the Treasury."

Sir, strengthening the Treasury by dead accumulation of cash above its actual needs is a weakening of the people, always.

But, sir, what I specially desired to call the attention of the House to was as to the one hundred million of "reserve" kept to redeem the greenbacks.

This fund has been kept since January 1, 1879, and it seems to be agreed that because there was an apparent necessity for it then it was properly continued and should be still kept.

This I do not believe, and think I can show. If the reason for its retention has ceased to exist, it ought to follow that the plan need not be continued.

It was provided for by the act of January 14, 1875—the resumption act—in substance, that to provide for the payment of such greenbacks as should be presented for redemption the Secretary might sell bonds for coin to hold for that purpose.

He was given discretion as to the amount. Mr. Secretary Sherman sold ninety-five and one-half millions of bonds, and out of the resources in the Treasury made the amount $100,000,000, and this was the "reserve."

Now, sir, when this act was passed the greenback was at a serious discount; its legality was denied by many prominent men; the Democratic party as a party assailed it so bitterly that at one time the test of Democratic fealty was the vigor of denunciation of the greenback. Sincere, doubtless, but erroneous; and no one was more vigorous than the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] against it.

The policy then was, even by the friends of the greenbacks, to regard them as an evidence of a forced loan only with some of the incidents of money, and that they should be speedily retired and canceled. The financiers then as now were loud for the national-bank notes instead of the greenback, on both sides, politically. It was the avowed policy of the officials of the party in power to retire, redeem, and cancel them. They were at a discount because of these doubts as to their validity; because they were a legal tender only for limited purposes; they could not be used to pay debts to the Government, and because of all this they were below par. Nay, more; the question of their legality was in the courts.

The great case of Hepburn against Griswold (8 Wallace), in which the Supreme Court held that they were not legal tender as to prior transactions, had been decided, and it was confidently asserted by excellent lawyers that the court would go further. The court was enlarged and the great legal-tender cases of Knox against Lee and Parker against Davis (12 Wallace), were decided favorably to the greenback but by a bare majority—the court dividing five to four—and Mr. Chief-Justice Chase, the father of the greenback in official life, delivered the dissenting opinion against it.

So certain were many of the best legal minds of the country that the greenback could not be legal-tender money for all purposes, that the court was still called on to pass upon the question, Railroad Company against Johnson (15 Wallace) and Savage against United States (92 United States) followed; but it was not till the legal-tender case (110 United States), decided March 3, 1884, that the question was decisively set at rest by the Supreme Court, not only as to the original act, but as to notes reissued under the act of May 31, 1878.

Therefore it was apparently, indeed absolutely, necessary that with all these doubts as to absolute validity and unlimited use as money, and a settled official policy of retiring them, a reserved fund should be established and maintained. But, sir, owing to all these discussions and pending litigation public feeling was excited, and finally, sir, in 1878 the whole policy was changed by the passage of the act of May 31 of that year, that the volume should not be reduced below the amount then outstanding—three hundred and forty-six millions, in round numbers—and that all returned to the Treasury should be reissued. In December of that year Mr. Sherman issued an order that they should be received for customs dues and internal-revenue taxes, and at once, because of that official recognition of their full legal-tender qualities, they rose at once to par and have stood so ever since, and will stay so.

No part of the one hundred millions reserve, except a few thousand dollars—less than fifteen thousand—in 1879, and a little a few months ago to get gold bars for export, has ever been used or desired to be used for redemption of the greenback.

It protects and redeems itself every time it is used in lawful payment of debt, and needs no redemption fund in gold or metal behind it, under the present recognition of it, which, sir, could not be changed by officials without causing a revolution!

Gentlemen have called attention to the tables in the Treasury reports, showing that there are and have been yearly "redemptions" to the amount of nearly $100,000,000 annually for years past.

But, sir, these are not "redemptions;" they are simply exchanges of new notes for old ones—every one of them. I would append the tables, but gentlemen will see that the Treasurer makes the clear statement that all these "redemptions" are reissue of new notes for soiled and mutilated notes returned.

Now, sir, I assert that, however wise the creation of the "reserve fund" was, the changed condition of public policy as well as express law renders the keeping it up unnecessary. It is of no practical value, and should be, as it may be safely, substantially abolished. Seven years' experience has proved it, at an expense in interest to this people of $25,000,000. With the changed condition of affairs must come new legislation—the mistakes of one Congress we correct in the next. Experience, the best of teachers, has proved that that vast fund is unnecessary.

Nothing is sacred in legislation that does not create a vested right in the citizen; and an expensive practice, experience, and laws found to be unnecessary can not be too soon abandoned.

Gentlemen talk about the necessity of plenty of cash assets, "working balances," &c. Why, sir, the revenues of this Government are as stable and as sure in anticipation as your salary. Roughly stated, they are a million of dollars per day—as certain as any human transaction can be; the expenses somewhat less. The Treasurer can not use a dollar except in pursuance of law, and this sum allowed by this resolution, one hundred millions of dollars, can only be trenched upon in one of three ways: first, by an excess of appropriations above receipts; second, by a legitimate call for gold for the purpose of export when it can not be as readily had at the great commercial centers; third, by an organized raid by speculators to create a panic in calling for gold for greenbacks in large quantities in the belief that the Treasury will be unable to respond.

The first two can never cause an inconvenience. The last would be promptly and effectively met by a tender of silver dollars. No organized raid upon the Treasury would possibly be made without the officials being made aware of it, and a silver tender would stop that at once.

For and in legitimate business the greenback is needed and is perfectly satisfactory to the people, and will always remain so. Legislation based on that assumption is perfectly, absolutely safe, at least. I shall act on it always, and my regret is that so much is reserved by this resolution. The amount is enormous and full and ample for all possible needs of the Treasury for payments and "working balance" for all the accounts on the books. Every dollar in the Treasury represents so much of the labor and toil of the country; it is so much of the accumulations of the productive industry of the people, and it lying unused when interest-bearing paper is due and uncalled is burning the candle at both ends.

If these bonds were not the property of the banks and used for their benefit for circulation, we should hear of none of this opposition to their payment; but the people wish the debt paid, and are under no obligation, legal or moral, to sustain these institutions as banks of issue.

That question may as well be regarded as settled now as later.

Nor am I concerned as to the future, as to what shall supply the vacuum caused by the retiring of their notes.

The Treasurer of the United States in a recent interview is reported as saying:

"What will be the effect of Mr. MORRISON'S resolution, if it eventually becomes law, upon the national banks?" was asked last night of Treasurer Jordan.

"The national banks," he replied, "hold about 65 or 70 per cent., or about $100,000,000 in round figures, of these bonds. The resolution would necessarily involve the retirement of the currency issued on these bonds, and the result would be a contraction of the currency to that extent. It would transfer the liability for the notes from the banks to the Treasury, and they would be redeemed in due course of time. Their redemption would certainly take a year, and probably two. Until they were redeemed the Government would profit. After that the places of the notes would probably be supplied by the silver certificates."

Sir, in the Forty-seventh Congress I had the honor to make a report for the Committee on Coinage on the proposal to suspend the coinage of the silver dollar, and ventured the suggestion in that report that this form of currency would supplant the national-bank note, and I congratulate myself that my crude and unprofessional idea of that day has now the indorsement of the able financier, the Treasurer of the United States.

A few words more, sir, and I shall have done.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has said—I quote from his speech:

Upon one or two other points brought out by the debate I wish to say a few words. My colleague from New York, who is also my colleague on the committee [Mr. HISCOCK], has stated that the introduction of this resolution and the peculiar manner in which it has been brought before this House for discussion is a declaration of war on the part of the Democratic majority of the House against a Democratic administration. It must be conceded, I think, that this resolution is at war with the declared policy and practice of the administration.

I think this is not disputed on either side of the House. Hence, governed by the ordinary rules of party management, I was exceedingly anxious to avoid the discussion of the resolution; and I resisted the adoption of the amendment to the rules by which it was brought on. But I was reminded by what happened of the time when I used to recite "The boy stood on the burning deck, whence all but he had fled;" for I found that I was not only the only Democrat who voted against the resolution, but notwithstanding what my friend from Illinois says about New York men, I was the only member from the city of New York who resisted its consideration. Hence I suppose there are some occasions on which the New York men do not hold together on the money question. Perhaps it is best to have the discussion. I think it very likely they were right, and that I was wrong in trying to resist the discussion; for in a country governed by public opinion, it is well that every great question affecting the employments of the people should be ventilated here and elsewhere; and any attempt to repress the judgment of the people would in my opinion be an error.

Hence I do not consider that the action of the Committee of Ways and Means in reporting this resolution, or of the Committee on Rules in bringing it before the House, is a declaration of war against the administration. If, however, it should be adopted, I should regard it as a vote of want of confidence in the policy of the administration, which under other forms of government would lead to the resignation of the ministry and under our form of government would lead to a change in the practice of the administration, because the administration is governed by law, and law is expressed by the action of Congress when approved by the President.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time this House has been called on to express public sentiment on financial questions for the benefit of this administration. We have been called on often in this Congress to do it, and have promptly acted, and always adversely to the views of the Executive and his Cabinet. We were called on by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in the Forty-eighth Congress on the proposal as to silver in the sundry civil appropriation bill, upon the message of the President before his inauguration, for constitutional reasons, addressed to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and others, because although elected, the President could not yet formally address Congress.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] will not forget I trust how swift and certain and definite the response was; it was a vote of want of confidence in advance. I repeat, sir, that the administration has never had the confidence and support of the people on financial questions; nor has it had a majority of this House.

But that Congress expired, and in the message and reports to this Congress, elected when he was, the questions were again presented.

The greenback was denounced, silver as legal tender as well; though the people had almost unanimously stood for the Treasury note, and its reissue under the act of 1878, the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, approved by the President and sent to us, says:

> We are in the presence of 550,000,000 full-tender dollars of gold, and 215,000,000 full-tender silver dollars, the latter number now practically irreducible.
> As metallists of both schools condemn all efforts by laws to manufacture a legal-tender equivalent of any nation's monetary unit out of the paper record of a promise to pay that unit, it here suffices to allude to that episode in our history before showing what the procedure of the Congress of the United States has been in making our monetary unit reside in coin, formerly of two metals, latterly in one metal, and the relation of the bimetallic theory and practice thereto, and to our immediate problem, the silver-dollar coinage. Indeed, the disparity between the two (285:100=100:35) in July, 1864, when Congress tried to compel their equality, is comment enough, from a financial point of view, upon the legal-tender laws of February 25, 1862, July 11, 1862, March 3, 1863, and the law of May 31, 1878; though I can not myself believe the voters of the several States will ever decide that their Federal Government holds as sovereign a power to issue and reissue Treasury notes and make them a legal tender in payment of private debts, as it has to coin money and borrow it.

Public opinion had thus failed to reach or impress them, although the Supreme Court had decided, in the cases I have cited, and settled the question of power, these officials can not believe that the voters will ever decide that the Federal Government holds the power to issue Treasury notes and make them a legal tender.

What can make them believe it? Not one raised from the dead!

I doubt whether there is a member here who would brave the public opinion in his district, any district in the United States, by proposing a bill to destroy the greenback or take from it its legal-tender quality.

And yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] talks about the effect of a vote of want of confidence.

A little later, see. In this Congress, vote after vote has been had upon questions involving the policy of continuing the national debt as a basis for national bank currency, of issuing silver certificates, ingrafting that proposal on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and by an overwhelming vote, and what difference has it made with the policy of the administration?

On the direct question of the free coinage of silver public sentiment expressed itself and more fully as against the suspension of silver coinage here. But, sir, instead of it having any effect, it seems to have hardened the hearts of the Treasury officials; for although the statute provides that the standard silver dollar shall be a legal tender for all debts and demands, public and private, the Treasury officials deny that it is a legal tender in payment of or for the redemption of a Treasury note.

This is well known to many gentlemen who now hear me, as recent statements of high officials.

But, sir, I am glad that a direct issue is presented, and that one so high in the councils and confidence of the administration as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has so plainly put the proposition that this vote, soon to be taken, will express either an indorsement or a want of confidence in the financial policy of the administration.

I predict, sir, that this resolution will be carried overwhelmingly, and in the same sentence, that it will not affect the policy of the administration as much as an idle breath!

No, sir; as admitted by the gentleman, such a vote, which would under a limited monarchy lead to a resignation of a ministry and a new election, in this Government of ours, in theory, of the people, will not, I venture the prediction, cause a ripple, unless of derision of our action in the two buildings at the other end of the Avenue!

We shall see. I confess to an eager curiosity to see the effect of this vote, and ask gentlemen to watch it with me.

Our experience in the past will be repeated in the near future, in the contest between the interests of the banks, the capitalists, and those with fixed incomes, and the will of the masses of the people, in this instance the people must yield again; of that I feel sure. The holders of the greenback need not have, nor have they, any fear as to their security. The magnificent resources of this great nation, all the elements of wealth within it, the productive energies of the best people on the globe, and the pledged faith of that people with whom national honor is a prominent characteristic, all unite in the guarantee that the Treasury note is worth its face and ever will be.

But what is needed now, sir, is a recognition on the part of the executive officers of the Government that they are not above the law, but subordinate to the will of the people expressed in these Halls in a constitutional manner.

The time will come, slowly possibly but none the less surely, when some representative of the people instead of fearing to lay his hand on the surplus in the Treasury, instead of being guilty (I quote from the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], and call his attention to my simile) "of an act of impiety approaching that in the olden time of laying hands by the unsanctified upon the ark of the covenant," will not hesitate to go further and like Moses of old abolish the worship of the golden calf, now set up for adoration at the Treasury and ministered to by the order of priesthood now in power.

Like its ancient prototype it shall be "ground to powder," and by the power of a people whose will is the law. [Applause.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, when this Congress reassembled after its vacation it found that there had been no call of bonds from the time when the Democratic administration assumed control of the executive government. It also found that there was a balance in the Treasury, not subject to any incumbrance, of $71,000,000 and $194,190,500 of 3 percents outstanding subject to call. The Committee on Ways and Means therefore had to consider whether this balance could not be used to diminish the interest-bearing public debt without affecting the public credit.

When the resolution under consideration was first proposed the question most prominently discussed in this House and the country was the silver question, on which each party was divided, and on which the present administration and Congress held different opinions. During the early months of this administration there were difficulties in the management of the Treasury, dangers to the financial condition of the country, that were met, overcome, and averted with ability and skill. However much we may disagree with some of the views of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Treasurer, however much we may criticise policies which do not entirely meet our approval, yet I take this occasion to express my confidence in their entire fidelity to their public trusts, in their purpose to maintain the public credit, and their obedience to the law as they understand and construe it.

That great Department has had few Secretaries at its head who will hereafter rank higher than Daniel Manning. It is a most intricate and complicated department; with its many bureaus and divisions, a vast machine; and it now requires an executive ability far beyond what was once demanded to supervise the numerous subordinate chiefs; and when to this immense labor and responsibility is added the higher duty imposed to manage the financial policy of the country, it is indeed a position to be accepted only from an imperative sense of duty. But whatever had been those embarrassments, they had been removed; whatever had been those dangers, they were over; and however we differed on the silver question, the facts then were that we had outstanding subject to our call $194,190,500 of 3 percents, and in the Treasury, according to the present mode of making the Treasury statement, a clear balance of $71,018,872.23; that in addition to this sum was $28,323,275.52 of minor and fractional silver coin; $53,638,417.54 held under sections 5222–5225 Revised Statutes, acts of June 20, 1874, and July 12, 1882, and $100,000,000 held for redemption of national Treasury notes, an aggregate of $252,980,565.29.

The $53,638,417.54 was held under acts which were differently construed. The minor and fractional silver coin was not available for the public debt, but it is an asset to give credit; and moreover it is not proper in Congress to longer refuse to enact such legislation as will utilize this idle sum; and it was believed that if the policy of the payment of the surplus upon the public debt was adopted it would force this legislation. There has, as is well known, always been a difference of opinion as to whether the act of July 12, 1882, required $100,000,000 in gold to be held for the redemption of Treasury notes, but it was not considered necessary to settle that difference in adopting this policy. This $100,000,000 surely would aid if not secure the maintenance of the public credit. So that after leaving these questions open and setting apart these three sums of $28,323,275.52, minor and fractional coin, $53,638,417.54 for the redemption of national-bank notes, and $100,000,000 for reserve, there remained on December 31, 1885, the sum of $71,018,872.23 for a working balance and the payment of the 3 percents.

The joint resolution now pending before the House was pending before the committee, and on the 30th of January that balance had increased to seventy-nine millions. It was believed by those who were in favor of it that the estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury that the income of the Government would be three hundred and fifteen millions was an underestimate by at least twenty millions. It was further believed that the accumulations of revenue over and above daily expenditures would be so great that ten millions a month could be paid without seriously diminishing the balance of seventy-nine millions. It was further believed, whether there was any pledge in political platforms or not, that it was the duty of the party in power to relieve as rapidly as it could every burden that was upon the neck of industry and to reduce every permanent source of expenditure, so that every reform that was possible might be made in the absence of a great public debt. It was further believed that the first postulate of true financial dealing was the payment of the public debt; that to this should be squared every other question; that to this should be subjected the consideration of every other financial problem; that the debt of the country was in no sense a blessing; that its constant, gradual, and, as far as practicable, rapid payment was the first necessity of true financial management—not so rapidly as to create revulsion; not so rapidly as to disturb the parity in value of the different kinds of money—gold, silver, and paper; not so rapidly as to permit the continuance of the unequal burdens which ought to be removed from the tax-payer, but always keeping in view as the object of the party in power and of the country under any administration the payment of the public debt.

Now, we were confronted with this state of the case: an outstanding public debt of $194,000,000, subject to call, bearing interest; an accumulation over and above daily expenditures at the rate of more than $8,000,000 per month; and this going on through the spring into the summer. So the resolution was reported and allowed to remain on the Calendar. We disagreed in that committee. The able gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], beside whom I have the pleasure of sitting and whose companionship during the last seven months has been one of the most delightful features of my short public service, from whose vast stores of information I have derived a pleasure and profit which will always be to me a source of gratification, predicted the same alarming result that he has predicted to-day.

We had an opportunity to put side by side the operation of practical execution with prophetic disaster; for the Secretary of the Treasury began to call $10,000,000 of the bonds monthly. For one, I was willing to allow the predictions made to be tested by the experiment. If we were correct, each month would show that the balance would be but slightly reduced; that the $10,000,000 would be paid out of the accumulated and the returning revenues of the Government; that as this money, like the rain, fell upon the country it would, like that rain, be drawn up and restored to the reservoir in the Treasury to be again poured out; so that there would be but a slight diminution of this balance. Has that been the result? By the 30th of June $50,000,000 had been called—$10,000,000 on the 1st of February, $10,000,000 on the 1st of March, $10,000,000 on the 1st of April, $10,000,000 on the 1st of May, and $10,000,000 on the 1st of June.

Now, let us look at the balances. On the 30th of January, before these payments had been made, the amount was $79,687,862; at the end of February, a short month, after the first call $72,298,202; at the close of March, $76,381,099; on the 30th of April, $77,330,999; on the 29th of May, $76,142,611, and on the 30th of June, $75,191,109. Thus we have $4,000,000 of diminution from the 30th of January to the 30th of June; and from the 27th of February to the 30th of June, $2,892,000 of increase. So much of the public debt paid, so much of the burden of interest removed, financial credit more firmly established, and an increment of $2,892,000.

This is the practical test. This is what has been done. If on the 27th of February this resolution had been called up for argument my distinguished and eloquent friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] would have made the same speech in substance that he has made to-day. He would have said, "$10,000,000 will go month after month, until finally the $70,000,000 balance will have disappeared and you will be face to face with silver, with disaster and ruin." We said to him, "Nay; not so. This is no bank. This is the ruling power of the country; that is taxing at the rate of $1,000,000 a day. This is not a loan machine, which can only pay to the borrower the amount which its depositors may bring in, and has no means of recovering money except by the payments of the borrower; this is a vast tax-gathering machine, which from day to day brings in from new resources—not those which have gone out—nearly $1,000,000, a sum sufficient, after paying daily expenditures, to meet this payment."

That is the practical result of the figures to-day. Of course, I take it for granted there is not a gentleman on this floor who would hesitate about the adoption of this resolution but for other considerations. Some say this will force the bonds to be paid in silver. I do not care to enter into that argument. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], to whom I always listen with profound attention, holds that we are bound by certain excerpts from letters of the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Sherman, in which he said to Mr. August Belmont certain things. I do not consider the extracts from that correspondence as warranting the construction which the gentleman puts upon them; nor do I understand the act of 1870 as the gentleman from New York does. I understand that act to reserve an option on the part of the Government to pay its bonds in gold or silver of the standard value of the date of the act; but that is only a part of the reservation. It is not only an option by the Government; it is a limitation upon the Government.

Standing as that Congress did, looking back through the horrors of the war and the financial experiences of that time, remembering what had occurred before the war when all seemed smiling and hopeful and peaceful, and how suddenly, like a thunderbolt, there came that great political convulsion, and with it its financial troubles—looking forward through the life of a generation, or two generations, which these bonds would have to run, that Congress put in not merely an option, but a limitation upon the Government. They said to the creditors who should hereafter purchase and hold those bonds, "We will not subject you to the fluctuations of the future, we will not subject you to the caprices of Congress, we will not subject you to the subtle and unknown powers of the laws of commerce, we will not subject you to that still more uncertain factor, the exhaustion of silver and gold mines, with the possibility of the discovery of new mines of one or the other metals; but adopting an inflexible standard, so far as a human standard can be inflexible, we fix as the value of the payment of these bonds the coins which are now legal." Whether these bonds to-day are to be paid in gold, gold being as 100 to 75 compared with silver, or whether in 1907, when silver may be better than gold, they shall be paid in silver, is a question I am willing to leave where the law leaves it—to the discretion of the executive department of the Government, under the power of this Congress to see that the public faith is preserved.

There was no doubt about this. I only give the opinion of the Attorney-General. The very same volume from which my colleague on the committee [Mr. HISCOCK] took the two excerpts of letters of Mr. Sherman contains the opinion of Attorney-General Devens, in which he says Mr. Sherman had no power to write on the face of these bonds any recital except payment in coin of the standard value in 1870.

I will append to my remarks the letter of Mr. Sherman to Mr. Devens and the official opinion of Mr. Devens, to show the Government of the United States through its proper officer submitted that question at that very time to the proper official of the Government, and that official gave the very opinion upon which I stand to-day.

No letter to Mr. Belmont, no letter of the Secretary to any banker can set aside that official opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, nor vary the provisions of the law which bound that Secretary, and all other Secretaries to pay those bonds in coin of the standard value at the date of the act which authorized the issue of the bonds. The terms of that act form part of the contract between the Government and bondholders.

So I care not to enter further into that discussion. Nor do I care to enter into discussion about the national banks. I have no fear that the national banks will not be able to take care of themselves.

One hundred and six millions of dollars of $136,000,000 now outstanding of the 3 percents are already in the vaults of the Treasury held to protect circulation of the national banks. All that is necessary is a mere change of security for these banks—the purchase of other bonds to take the place of these bonds. This will be gradually done. There will be a slight loss of interest to the banks. At the present premium on 4 percents an investment in them will pay about 2½ per cent. per annum instead of 3 per cent. This difference will not of itself cause contraction.

Of course there will be some contraction of national-bank currency. How much no one can foresee. That will depend upon whether we have revival of business; whether money being more plentiful will be more profitable; whether there will be a larger interest for active capital, or whether there will be a demand for money. It is the activity rather than the amount of money that will regulate this. When men are very busy and enterprises are profitable money is sought by the active and enterprising and interest cheerfully paid. When ready sale at profitable prices is found for the products of the farm and factory, when wages are paid for full days' work on fabrics sold at a fair profit, then the banks find no trouble in loaning all the currency they can control. A short crop abroad, a large crop here, or the reverse, are factors here.

But in any event the problem of what shall be done with national-bank notes under the steady decrease of the national debt must some day be met and answered. We must pay that debt, and its payment must not be suspended until we answer that question. When the banks realize that the bonds are to be called in as rapidly as practicable they will furnish some reasonable answer. I have no doubt that their financial skill is sufficient for the settlement of this question.

I insert here a letter from Mr. Trenholm, Comptroller of the Currency, a most accomplished officer, of rare attainments, and for whom, although I do not agree with some of his views, I have the most sincere respect, exhibiting what bonds are held by the Treasurer to secure the circulation of the national banks:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, July 12, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of this date and in reply to send you the following statement in answer to the second interrogatory contained therein:

United States bonds held by the Treasurer to secure the circulation of national banks at the close of business July 10, 1886, are as follows:

3 per cent. loan July 12, 1882	$106,773,600
4 per cent. consols of 1907	114,212,500
4½ funded loan of 1891	50,831,700
6 per cent. Pacific Railroad	3,565,000
	275,382,800

The answers to the remaining interrogatories will form the subject of a communication from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

W. L. TRENHOLM, Comptroller.

Hon. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE, House of Representatives.

The change from $106,773,600 in 3 percents to 4 or 4½ percents under monthly calls of $10,000,000 will be gradually accomplished through fourteen months from now, for it will require at least fourteen months, perhaps longer, to call in the outstanding 3 percents. This change so gradually done can not seriously affect the financial enterprises of a people possessing a circulation of over $1,500,000,000. The call of these bonds means also the output of $10,000,000 monthly. This sum must seek investment; its owners need the interest to live on. My colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is alarmed at the predicted return from abroad of American securities. He may dismiss his fears.

They will not be returned; but all that are returned and are valuable will find purchasers.

Neither he nor my friend [Mr. HEWITT] gives due allowance to one cause for idle money. For years the world has been absorbing all its spare capital in railroad building, in opening new lines of transportation, and constructing the appliances for trade. The facilities for commerce in many parts of the world thus created are sufficient for many years to come. The money-holders of the world have not yet found other enterprises into which they can put their capital. I commend to these gentlemen the late report of the Commissioner of Labor, a most suggestive and valuable report; and I venture to ask pardon for saying the report of an able man, not yet quite sound, but on the highway to orthodoxy. I therefore am not willing to suspend the reduction of the public debt because the call of the 3 percents may contract the national-bank currency.

Another matter I wish to notice: Both the gentlemen from New York [Mr. HEWITT and Mr. HISCOCK] say the $70,000,000 we hold for the national banks constitute a trust fund, belonging to the banks. This resolution does not touch that question. It may be so, and it may not be so. This sum consists of four distinct classes; $10,445,114 is the 5 per cent. fund held for the redemption of national-bank notes, and is part of the legal reserve held by those banks to secure deposits, and stands on an entirely different footing from the $60,146,726.85, which consists of three distinct funds. Deposits of "lawful money" are made for the redemption of national banks which have "failed," of national banks in process of "liquidation" or reducing circulation, and of banks which have renewed their charters and have not been able to call in all their notes outstanding at the time of the renewal.

Of all deposits under the act of 1882 the gains belong to the Government. Bankers claim that the gains on other deposits ought to belong to the banks. Did they not get dollar for dollar when they loaned their dollar across the counter? They sold that dollar to the borrower and that dollar has been paid back, if not by that dollar by some other dollar, and they are not the losers of it. Whether the Government is or is not the beneficiary of these gains is a question I am willing to remit to the future for settlement, when by process of time it can be definitely ascertained what "the gains" are. This may require some years.

That fund has been increased. It is steadily increasing. There need be no alarm, the monthly increase will be larger than the monthly withdrawal. I hold in my hand the statement of December 31, 1885, when it was $53,638,417. In June, 1886, six months afterward, it was $70,693,820, showing an increase of $17,000,000. It is therefore not a liability to be afraid of.

But, Mr. Chairman, in what sense do these gentlemen mean that this is a "trust" fund? Do they mean that the identical money deposited is set apart and held separately as a "trust fund?" Surely not, for this has never been and is not now done. Do they mean that any separate, specific sum is held for this fund? Surely not, for this has never been so. Do they mean that the United States is under obligation to redeem in lawful money when presented any of the national-bank notes for the redemption of which this deposit has been made? Then we agree. This is a debt, an obligation, and the Government must be ready to meet it, must be ready to thus redeem on presentation, precisely as a bank must pay the check of a depositor on presentation; and a reserve, calculated on precisely similiar principles, must be held for that purpose. This is all of that. Now by experience we know that the monthly deposit is larger than the monthly redemption; and we can not be frightened by this. But the resolution leaves that sum untouched. The balance of which it speaks is that residue after this sum has been set apart as a liability. And this answers all said on that subject.

It has been said that this is a vote of want of confidence in the President and his administration. I united in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means that this resolution be adopted, in no partisan spirit; I shall discuss it now in no partisan spirit. I know not how gentlemen know what are the views of the President on this subject. In his courage, his sincerity, and his sense of duty I have implicit confidence. He will discharge his duty as his conscience commands; so will we; and a vote here can never be construed to mean more nor less than thus did duty require.

During this debate the question has been asked, what shall be done as to the sinking fund when all the 3 percents are called? As this can not be done until a new Congress, fresh from a new election, assembles, I remit that question to that Congress.

It seems clear that this Congress will not revise the tariff, and therefore will not reduce taxation. The sum required for the sinking fund and the excess of revenues over expenditures the past fiscal year exceeded $90,000,000. At the present rates of taxation this aggregate will be greater at the expiration of this fiscal year. Entering the year with a balance of $75,191,107, the country will not accept as an excuse for prolonging the payment of an interest-bearing debt that we were in perplexity as to what was wise to enact concerning the disposition of the sinking fund in 1888. Let us discharge the duty of to-day, and trust our successors with the discharge of the duties of their day.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit other considerations. I believe gold and silver ought to be kept together, if possible. I am sincerely a bimetallist. I do not want to obliterate silver from the money metals of the world. As commodities gold will bring more in the market than silver. It was not always so; it may not always be so. For years Congress has declared that silver shall be held to be money; this is "the law of the land." But this imposes on Congress the duty of doing all possible to keep the parity of values. And it is also the duty of all executive and administrative officers to recognize this "law of the land," and to so manage, if it be possible, the financial matters intrusted to them as to maintain this parity. This can be done at least for months. The same policy of payment pursued since February 1 will have precisely the same result.

Not a dollar of silver would be paid. The payments will be in this way as in the last five months: Checks on banks will be sent to the places where there are bond-holders or other persons holding certificates of Government indebtedness, and the sums thus paid, being necessary for the payment of a million dollars a day of customs and of taxes, will instantly be paid back through the custom-house or the internal-revenue offices precisely as was the case in July. Four million dollars were paid on the 1st of July as part of the sinking fund. Now, there have been paid into the Treasury since that time in the shape of customs duties $6,098,000, from internal-revenue sources $4,155,000, and miscellaneous sums increasing the aggregate to about $11,000,000 since July 1, and I am informed that in addition to that sum over $1,200,000 have been this day paid into the Treasury.

Four millions of dollars were paid out for that portion of the expenditures involved in the sinking fund, and $11,000,000 returned to replace it. If we will not make these payments, nevertheless taxes must come in. These taxes must come into the Treasury either from that or from some other source. Every dollar we lock up and keep locked up in the Treasury must be, for taxing purposes, replaced by some other dollar gathered from some other source.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that this Government has no power to hold any more dollars in its Treasury than are necessary for the protection of the public credit; and I contend further that it has been shown by this experiment that the public debt can be thus reduced. But besides that there is a growing feeling throughout the country that in some way the Government must have a certain amount of good interest-bearing securities to be the basis of investments, and for savings-banks and for other institutions of like character; that for some reason, out of some construction of the Constitution, we must have in some way some large amount of debt in the shape of good securities to be the basis of banking and of investments. For one, Mr. Chairman, I desire to have that conviction forever taken from the public mind. We ought not for a moment to attempt to consider the possibility that our securities shall be permanent as a debt on the labor of the nation.

Debt is never wealth. It is always the representative of past expenditure. It is the difference between that which a man was able to give and that which he promised to give for some past investment or expenditure. Let us as we get wealthier pay off these debts. Let us strive to separate taxation from debt by having no debt. Let us get ready by our payments to reform the tariff, to revise its inequalities, to free ourselves from the internal-revenue system, to relieve every industrial burden under which we groan, to make new and favorable conditions for labor, and try to get rid of all the objections which grow out of a public debt. Let the people free themselves from these obligations, so that they may need no larger revenue than is necessary to administer justice, to protect the citizen, to defend the country from foreign invasion. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I look forward with abiding hope, not for myself but for my children, to a day when this great land of ours, stretching from sea to sea and not from lake to Gulf, but taking the lakes in our embrace and holding the Gulf as our mare clausum, shall owe no indebtedness, when no man shall have in his possession an obligation over the signature of the United States of America. [Applause.] I want to pay all our debt according to its tenor for whatever purpose it was issued, for whatever object it was created. Let us pay it, too, as promptly as we can, and let the country and the world know that we are going to pay it as fast as the resources are in our possession with which to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I shall reserve the five minutes, having promised to yield that time during the discussion to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

I append extract from a letter from C. N. Jordan, esq., Treasurer.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1877.

SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to, and ask your opinion upon, the following questions growing out of the refunding act of July 14, 1870, to wit:

Can I stipulate in the body of the 4 per cent. bonds about to be issued that they shall be redeemable in coin of the present standard value; that is, the standard value at the date of their issue, or must it be the date of the law?

I submit a statement prepared by Hon. H. F. French, assistant Secretary, having reference to the laws.

It may become important to the public interests to make the new bonds payable in coin of the present standard; that is, gold coin. Some doubts have been expressed upon whether previous bonds issued under acts passed prior to 1873 are not legally payable in silver coin. This question may become important, as any doubt upon the legal terms of a public security affects its value.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES DEVENS, Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, April 26, 1877.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 21st instant, requesting my opinion upon the following question growing out of the refunding act of July 14, 1870, to wit, "Can I stipulate in the body of the 4 per cent. bonds about to be issued that they shall be redeemable in coin of the present value, that is, the standard value at the date of their issue, or must it be the date of the law," I have the honor to reply:

The act provides for the issue of bonds "redeemable in coin of the present standard value." The word "present" undoubtedly refers as a matter of date to the time when the act was passed, and not to the time when the bonds were thereafter issued. It contemplated that a long period would elapse before it would finally be carried into effect, and that changes in the coinage of the country might occur during that period.

Whatever changes in the coinage should occur, these bonds were, however, to be redeemed in coin of the standard value as it existed at the date of the act. By this provision the holder was guarded against any depreciation that might take place in the value of the coin, and the Government would not be compelled to pay the additional value should the coinage be appreciated. All the bonds issued under the act were to stand alike, no matter what was the date when such bonds were issued. Each was to be redeemable in coin which was included in the authorized coinage of the country at the date referred to, it being of the standard value as it then existed. Since the law was passed, no change has taken place in the standard value of the coin. It is understood that there has been a certain change in the coinage of the country, and that silver dollars have now ceased to exist practically as coin.

It has been further provided by the statute of February 12, 1873 (Revised Statutes, sections 3585-6) that "the silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment."

Notwithstanding this practical change in the coinage of the country, and the passage of this act in regard to legal tenders, the form of bond to be issued by you should not be changed so far as the mode in which it is to be redeemed is concerned. It was not intended that this should be varied according to the changes which might be made in the coinage, because a definite rule was given by reference to the coin of a particular date. That which will pay the bonds heretofore issued under this act will pay the bonds which you may hereafter issue.

It can not be authoritatively said that the words "payable in coin" or "payable in gold" are equivalent to the words used by the statute. Even if this leaves open for discussion the question whether bonds issued under this act are or are not redeemable in silver coin of the character and standard which existed July 14, 1870, it is not a doubt which it is in your power to remedy by the use of words in the bond other than those which this statute provides.

While I comprehend the difficulty suggested in your letter and the convenience that there might be in removing any question upon this matter, I am, therefore, of opinion that it would not be safe to issue the bonds, except as redeemable in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. DEVENS, Attorney-General.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

A copy of this reply has been forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN, Treasurer United States.

Hon. WILLIAM C. P. BRECKINRIDGE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, this resolution, coming as it does from a Democratic majority in one branch of the Government addressed to a Democratic Executive in control of another branch of the Government, is, to say the least, very exceptional and most remarkable. It is a proposition coming from a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means which is in political accord with the present President of the United States, and will undoubtedly receive the approval of the majority on the other side of the Chamber. It is a proposition to compel the President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury to do that which they have always had the power to do, that which they now have authority to do under section 2 of the act of March 3, 1881.

The administration, which is in accord with the committee that reports this resolution, has been in power sixteen months. When it came into power it found the following section on the statute-books of the country:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of the United States bonds.

Not only has the Secretary of the Treasury the power to call in and pay off the bonds the moment they are redeemable, but he has the power under that section of the statute to go into the money markets of the world, wherever our bonds are held, and buy them, even if they are not yet matured. And yet in sixteen months a Democratic administration, with the expressed and confessed authority to do it, has called but fifty-eight millions of Government bonds for redemption, and leaves oustanding to-day one hundred and forty millions or more of the 5 percents extended, now known as the 3 percents, which are redeemable at the pleasure of the Government.

It is not to be wondered at, Mr. Chairman, that with a record like this, in view of the professions that have heretofore been made by the Democratic party, in view of their declarations in platform and upon public rostrum in favor of the distribution of the surplus for the payment of Government bonds, characterizing the Republican party, as they have repeatedly done, as dishonest for keeping the surplus in the public Treasury—I say it is not surprising, in view of the record made by its own administration, that the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, under the leadership of the leader of one wing of the Democratic party, should insist that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury should keep the pledges which they made to the people. And it is all the more suggestive and trying to these Democratic friends of ours, Mr. Chairman, when they look back to the record made by the Republican party on this very subject, a record that we commenced making from the very close of the war, and of which all of us are justly proud, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania was frank enough to say had paid over twelve hundred millions of public indebtedness since the conclusion of hostilities and the reign of peace. I say it is not surprising, looking at the record the Republican party had made and then looking at the first sixteen months of record made by a Democratic administration, that the two wings of the Democratic party on this floor—in the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—should flap together and demand the President should pay out some of this surplus on the public bonds of the country, no matter what consequences would follow.

Look at the record. In 1881, two years after the resumption of specie payments, the Republican Secretary of the Treasury called in one hundred and twenty-one millions of Government bonds, and paid them off. In 1882, the Republican Secretary of the Treasury called in one hundred and seventy-three millions of Government bonds and paid them off. In 1883 the same Secretary called in eighty-six millions; and in 1884 over seventy millions of the Government bonds were paid off and canceled. In your first sixteen months you have paid off $58,133,000. We averaged in the last four years $153,000,000 every sixteen months, and you have made a record of but fifty-eight millions in the same length of time. It is not to be marveled at that the Democratic majority here smart under such a contrast and have become impatient with its own administration and distrustful of its capacity for financial management.

There is another remarkable feature to which I desire to call attention in this connection. When a Republican Secretary of the Treasury was calling in these numerous sums and canceling the bonds we had no such surplus in the public Treasury as you have to-day. In 1880 we had but $141,000,000; and in that one hundred and forty-one millions were included twenty-six millions of fractional silver coin which are not included in the surplus reported by the present Secretary of the Treasury, although he reports as on hand more than twenty-nine millions of such coin, which he does not regard as available. In 1881, when we called in one hundred and seventy-three millions of bonds, in November of that year there was but $100,069,000 in the Treasury remaining after that vast payment. In November, 1882, we had one hundred and sixty-six millions of a surplus, including the fractional coin, and during that year we called in $86,581,000. In November, 1883, we had one hundred and thirty-four millions of a surplus, and through that year called in $70,000,000. To-day, according to the report of the Treasurer of the United States, we have, exclusive of fractional silver coin, over $75,000,000. Why does not the administration of Grover Cleveland pay out that balance upon the public debt? There are one hundred and forty millions due and payable. Secretary Folger said, in his annual report of 1883, if the estimated receipts should continue all the 3 percents could be paid off in three and one-half years, and before the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887. One hundred and forty millions are yet outstanding, and but six months of these three and one-half years are yet remaining. Why they have not been paid some one on the other side close to the administration should be able to tell us.

Some gentlemen of the majority in the confidence of the administration ought to explain to us why the Secretary does not exercise the discretion given him by the statute and distribute the surplus. There must be some valid reason for it, some controlling reason, which those charged with the management of our financial affairs know and realize better than we can. The Secretary has got the power to do it now, full and complete, as I have shown you by public law. I believe that discretion ought to be left with the executive officers of the Government. I believe it to be a wise discretion. I believe it to be a judicious thing to give the officers charged with the management of the financial affairs of the Government, charged by the people, the power to call the bonds or withhold a call for bonds whenever the condition of the Treasury will permit the one or the other. The hands of the President and Secretary should not be tied; they should have full power to act under the laws as they are, and then held to the highest responsibility and strictest accountability.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, unless the amendment I offered at the beginning of this discussion, and another amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], and still another which will be presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], shall be adopted by this House, I shall feel constrained to give a negative vote on the resolution presented by the Committee on Ways and Means. Of course we can not help, I can not help, no gentlemen on this side can help, the Democratic party voting to-day a want of confidence in its own administration. We can not prevent you from passing a vote of condemnation on the President of the United States and his Secretary, and that is what this resolution means if it becomes a law, and that is what you are doing when you vote for it.

Why, think of it, Mr. Chairman! A Republican Secretary of the Treasury presided over the financial affairs of this Government from 1861 to 1885, a period of twenty-four years, and no such proposition as this ever passed. A Republican Secretary of the Treasury was in charge from 1875 until 1885, covering the years of resumption, a period of more that ten years; eight years of that time the Democratic party had control of this House. The Republican Secretary of the Treasury exercised discretion under the act of March 3, 1881, and a Democratic House, with a majority larger than you have to-day, never thought of taking that discretion away from the Republican President or the Republican Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McKINLEY. Did you ever pass a resolution to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out the surplus?

Mr. MORRISON. I introduced the proposition and sent it to the Committee on Ways and Means, and I never could get it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKINLEY. Exactly.

Mr. MORRISON. I offered it in the House of Representatives and had the support of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in an attempt to pass it, but was kept from passing it by a point of order coming from the Republican side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McKINLEY. Yes; but you never passed it. You had control of the House; you had the Committee on Rules; you could have fixed a time for considering it, just as you fixed a time for considering it in this Congress; you had a larger majority then than you have now. But, whatever you may have done in the committee, whatever you may have attempted to do on the floor of the House, one thing is certain, you never did pass a resolution taking away that discretion from the Republican President and the Republican Secretary of the Treasury. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MORRISON. I was prevented by the co-operation of Democrats with that side of the House.

Mr. McKINLEY. That is, the two wings of the Democratic party were not in harmony, and one wing, with the aid of the Republicans, prevented you from taking away that statutory discretion from the Republican Secretary of the Treasury. But now that you have got the Presidency; now that you have got the administration of the Treasury Department, both wings of the Democratic party "flap together" in denouncing a Democratic Secretary and a Democratic President of the United States for not calling in the bonds and absorbing the surplus. And this is not to be wondered at, Mr. Chairman. Why, the campaign of 1884 was waged and won upon the howl raised all over this country that the Republicans had $400,000,000 of idle surplus in the Treasury, and would not pay the honest debts of the Government.

Governor Hendricks, it is alleged, said that all over the West. I have no doubt that my greenback friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] said it all over his State. I know that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in his famous speech at Nashville, Tenn., when he was making that triumphal tariff march through the South [laughter], I remember that when he was making that grand march from Atlanta to the sea [renewed laughter], carrying the banner of protection, he said there were three hundred millions of surplus in the public Treasury and that the administration of Grover Cleveland would take it out and pay the public debt with it.

Mr. RANDALL. I am beginning in that direction now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McKINLEY. Yes; you are beginning, but you are beginning sixteen months after your administration has failed to do it [applause on the Republican side], and you have not got very far yet. [Laughter.] Supposing this resolution passes this House, supposing it passes the Senate, to give it any force it must have the approval of the President of the United States, and by this resolution you are asking that the President shall do what for sixteen months he has refused to do.

He will lay down the pen, which with him within the last few weeks has been mightier than the sword [laughter], and will refuse to sign your resolution, or he will take up a fresh and newly sharpened pen and use it; he will veto your joint resolution if half the disturbance would follow its execution which the officials in the Treasury predict, and the surplus will still remain in the Treasury to be paid whenever and in such sums as in his wisdom and that of the Secretary will be within the line of safety. I hesitate to join even with the Democrats in taking away from their administration a discretion which Republican administrations have always enjoyed. I would want that discretion continued if we still had the administration, and if is to be taken away from yours without qualification or condition it must be your act, not mine. If this is a mere play of politics, if it is a mere play for postion, you are welcome to it, gentlemen; when your own Secretary of the Treasury solemnly tells the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in an official communication, that if this resolution passes it will impair the public credit, will shake public confidence, will destroy the good financial name which we have enjoyed so long, thanks to Republican fidelity, that it will leave no working balance for the great transactions of the Government, if that is any solace or comfort in your affliction we cheerfully grant it to you; when he says another thing, that this resolution means trenching upon the one hundred millions which is kept as a redemption fund for the legal-tender notes of the country, and he asks his Democratic friends not to do it for the sake of our public credit and our financial honor, we give you the benefit of all the political advantage there is in it. It is your quarrel, now ours. Yet they do it, they heed not the warnings of their own officials whom they should trust, and in fact this Congress seems to be given to doing just what the President does not want it to do. If there is anything upon which the majority of this House and the President are in accord, I would like to know it.

Several MEMBERS (on the Republican side). Vetoing pension bills.

Mr. McKINLEY. In that they may be a happy family.

Why, Mr. Chairman, in the annual message of the President of the United States and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury this Congress was asked to do three things: First, to retire the greenbacks, to get them out of circulation, to pay them off; second, to suspend the coinage of silver. The fact is the President asked that before he became President. [Laughter.] He could not wait until he was inaugurated; he so feared calamity from its continuance. He therefore repeats in his formal message to Congress the statement that unless this Congress shall suspend silver coinage, the financial situation of the country will be very much disturbed. Then finally he asks you to revise the tariff. What have you done in the way of carrying out these recommendations?

You have not retired the greenbacks; you have not suspended silver coinage; you have not revised the tariff—at least you have not revised it under the leadership of my friend, Colonel MORRISON; I do not know what you may do under the leadership of "Colonel" RANDALL. [Laughter.] What a delightful situation! [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania about three or four weeks ago showed his contempt for the tariff bill of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means; and only the other day the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee showed his positive contempt for the attempt of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make a tariff bill. [Laughter.] So it goes. There is not a single thing upon which the members of this Democratic party in this House agree and are in positive accord except in getting the offices. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRISON. And we are only doing middling well at that. [Laughter.]

Mc McKINLEY. Yes; and in that particular you are getting along very slowly. [Laughter and applause.]

But my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], impatient with the delay in getting offices when they had an appropriation bill before this House a week or two ago, undertook to break down the civil-service law by a rider on that bill. It seems that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his "wing" are for the spoils. I was glad to find my honest and honored friend from Illinois standing against that covert attempt to nullify and destroy a public statute. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRISON. Now the gentleman is getting on my side.

Mr. McKINLEY. After what I have stated, and much more which I might state in the same connection, is it to be wondered at that Secretary Manning, weary of the burdens of his office, indites a letter to the President of the United States, dated May 20, 1886, in which he says:

The reforms in our fiscal policy which you have maintained—

That is, keeping up the credit of the Government and keeping up the surplus in the Treasury—and which have been commended to the wisdom of the legislative branch—

None of which the legislative branch has paid any attention to—

are reforms necessary to our safety, binding in honor, obligatory in the traditions of the Democracy, set down with promises in our statute-book?

That is what Mr. Manning says to President Cleveland, in giving notice of his intention to retire from the Treasury. Listen to what the President says in his response to the Secretary:

I have hoped that the day was at hand when the party to which we belong, influenced largely by faith and confidence in you and in the wisdom of your views, would be quickened—in the sense of responsibility and led to a more harmonious action upon the important questions with which you have had to deal.

That is the way the President felt May 28, 1886.

Mr. SESSIONS. The hope of the ungodly shall perish.

Mr. MCKINLEY. How will the President feel after this resolution of condemnation, this resolution of censure, this resolution of disapproval, this resolution of want of confidence? As the gentleman from New York told you this morning, he can not resign and go to the country; but every one of you and every one of us will go to the country; and the issue will then be made up. If President Cleveland vetoes your resolution, you can go to the country on that. You will then have an issue with your own President. The $400,000,000 that it is charged Mr. Hendricks said was in the Treasury, the $300,000,000 which the gentleman from Pennsylvania said was in the Treasury, will in the mean time remain there, unless the Secretary exercises the discretion he now has and pays a part or the whole of it out.

I only wish to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I hope the amendment I have submitted and others which I have indicated will be adopted. It seems to me absolutely demanded that they should if this resolution is to pass. Let us save that reserve, the $100,000,000, from encroachment, so that the $346,000,000 of promises of the National Government shall be kept sacred and at par as they are to-day. Let us maintain the old Republican policy; let us keep our promises; and in adopting my amendment we hold on to the Republican position and Republican precedents. If we will do this, and will adopt an amendment giving the Secretary of the Treasury a fair working balance, which any business man or corporation would keep—if we will do these two things, then your resolution will be harmless and it may be spared the veto of the President. [Loud applause.]

In the report of the Treasurer of the United States of November 1, 1883, there is an exhibit and statement, which I herewith append, and also the statement of the Treasurer of the United States, of June 30, 1886:

THE RESERVE.

The following statement shows the excess of the cash assets of the Government over its net demand liabilities on the 1st day of November, 1883, compared with that on the same date in 1882:

Reserve—Excess of assets	135,151,688 99	160,822,545 42

It will be seen that the reserve is ascertained by deducting from the cash in the Treasury the aggregate of the current liabilities other than United States notes, the amounts of certificates and other obligations nominally outstanding having been first reduced by the amounts of those held by the Treasnry.

The reserve increased from $135,151,688.99 in 1882 to $160,822,545.42, due to the increase in the cash owned by the Government of $8,918,286.36 in gold coin and bullion, $4,831,403.59 in silver dollars and bullion, and $4,771,969.57 in currency; and to the decrease in the liabilities for bonds and interest of $9,486,490.52, and in the funds for redemption of national-bank notes of $2,747,564.70. This aggregate increase of $30,755,714.74 is, however, reduced to $25,670,856.43 by the increase in the liabilities on account of Post-Office Department, outstanding drafts and checks and disbursing officers' balances of $4,297,020.12, and by an actual decrease in the fractional silver coin in the Treasury and the funds on deposit with national-bank depositaries of $787,838.19.

The amount of the reserve a year ago would, however, have appeared greater by $12,063,714.72 had not payment been anticipated of that amount of called bonds not then matured; which should be considered in making any comparison.

The following table shows, for the first day of each of the past thirteen months, the amount of the current liabilities exclusive of United States notes; the amount including such notes; and the cash in the Treasury, certificates for gold, silver, and currency deposits and the moneys held for the redemption of the same, having been deducted; also the percentage of the reserve ascertained as stated above, to the United States notes outstanding, and of the cash to current liabilities including those notes:

Month.	Current liabilities, excluding United States notes and coin and currency certificates.	Current liabilities, excluding certificates and including United States notes, namely, $346,681,016.	Cash, less amount of coin and currency certificates.	Percentage of reserve to United States notes outstanding.	Percentage of cash to demand liabilities, including United States notes, certificates having been eliminated.

Average for 59 months	98,059,296 47	444,740,312 47	233,424,407 81	39.0	52.5

The range of the percentage of the reserve to the amount of United States notes outstanding ($346,681,016) during the period was from 32.2 per cent. in January to 46.4 per cent. in November, 1883; and the average for the four years and eleven months since the resumption of specie payments was 39 per cent.

Upon the assumption that the percentage should be computed between the cash in the Treasury and the liabilities, including United States notes, all certificates and the moneys for their redemption being excluded, the range was from 48.8 per cent. to 58.2 per cent. during the thirteen months, and averaged 52.5 per cent. for the fifty-nine months since resumption.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] yield the residue of his time?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I agreed that, so far as our side of the House was concerned, the time should be under the control of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. If the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] desires to speak now in his own time I have no doubt the gentleman from Maine will be glad to give way.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the Chair be kind enough to intimate what time remains on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] will expire at twenty-five minutes before 3 o'clock. Five minutes of the time remaining belong to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], having been yielded to him by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and the remaining twenty minutes are under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], having been reserved by him.

Mr. REED, of Maine. So that we now have thirty-two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understands.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have seven minutes, which I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor in the observations I shall make to allow a little time for our Democratic brethren to recover from the somewhat severe description of their unfortunate situation to which they have just listened [laughter], and shall call their attention back to the strictly financial bearings of this matter.

I am not one of those who have the misfortune to believe my opinions on questions of finance or of the Constitution are final and infallible. I have no hope to do more than to indicate to the House some reasons why I think this resolution ought not to pass. Gentlemen on the other side in their discussion of this matter seem to have forgotten a considerable part of recent history. They seem to have forgotten the United States Treasury for many years had ceased to be a mere instrument for collection and disbursement of its own revenue. Thanks to a long series of legislative acts, the Treasury of the United States has added to its functions that of becoming in large measure the base upon which our financial and bank system rests.

With that change of situation comes a change of duties. Among the foremost duties of the Treasury of the United States to-day is to preserve a sound currency, to maintain public confidence, and to present a firm basis for the sound business of the country.

The saving of a million or two of dollars per year at the expense of the business interests of the country, at the expense of its business prosperity, is too silly to be entertained by grown men intrusted with the powers and living under the obligation under which we live.

So that whoever votes on this question without considering the whole of the situation does injustice to his own good sense and does injustice to the country as well.

Now, let us see what was the condition of the Treasury of the United States at the time when the Republican party left it and its condition to-day. And let us see if we can account for the change which has been made in it. It will be remembered, and indeed has been repeated here, that gentlemen of the Democratic party fought the last campaign on the statement that there was a large sum of money in the Treasury which ought to come out, and the size of that statement always depended upon the rank the man held in the party. [Laughter and applause.] The candidate for Vice-President boldly put it at $400,000,000, because the Democratic party would probably absorb more from him than they would from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], who only made it $300,000,000.

Mr. BLAND. Was not that $400,000,000——

Mr. REED, of Maine. I can not go into the silver question now. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLAND. I want to make this remark.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Excuse me.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Calkins, of Indiana, your candidate for governor, made that statement.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The gentleman can not follow the thread of my discourse. That is my misfortune, that there are some who can not. [Laughter.] Having fought that campaign on this basis, it became necessary for the Democratic party to make an onslaught to-day. Why have they not made it before? As my friend has well said, this has been going on for sixteen months. This very resolution was reported months and months ago. Why have they not brought it up until this time? Because it is a mere political game. It is because they thought they could pass it in this House, and they knew the Senate would be busy on appropriation bills and that it might not pass through the Senate and never be vetoed by the President, and they could go to the country a second time with a second edition of the same paper. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, what were the figures on the 4th of March when the Democrats took possession of the country? Net balance, March 4—and I take it from the report of the Democratic Secretary—$8,764,590.11. Immediately upon their accession to power they began to increase this balance. They began to add to the $400,000,000, according to one estimate, or the $300,000,000, or whatever was the truth or rather untruth about the matter. [Laughter.] On the 1st day of November they had, instead of $8,000,000, $66,000,000 added to this mythical sum for which the gentleman from Pennsylvania vouched in part and the gentleman who was a candidate for Vice-President vouched for in whole. To-day the amount of the balance, instead of being $8,000,000, is $75,000,000.

In other words, the Democratic party, after having gone to the country with a statement that there was the sum of $400,000,000 improperly in the Treasury, increased that sum, if it ever existed, by $75,000,000; and what does the Democratic House propose to do? Does it propose to take out the $300,000,000 of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? Not a bit of it. They simply propose, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said to-day on the floor—they simply propose to go back to the condition of the Treasury as it was when the Republicans left it. In other words, their action here to-day, although it is an attempt to make the people believe that they are trying to get out of the Treasury some of that mythical $300,000,000, is an attempt to get out not a single cent of it, but only to put the $75,000,000 out which the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury has put into it in addition to what was there when he took possession.

Now, is not that line of conduct perfectly characteristic of the action of the Democratic leaders? Is it not perfectly of a piece with their method of presentation of facts to the people? Does it not perfectly agree with that sublime economy which saves money on an appropriation bill and still pays it out of the Treasury? Why it is all of a piece. [Laughter.]

Why is it that the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury has behaved in this manner? What is his purpose; what is his object? Let us deal fairly and frankly with him. He never made the $400,000,000 assertion; he never even made the $300,000,000 one [laughter]; but he stood in the position of Secretary of the Treasury with the finances of the country resting upon him. It became necessary for him to act.

On the one hand was stump oratory and on the other hand was the financial safety of the country. Why, no man could hesitate what to do.

Mr. STRUBLE (from his seat). Especially after the election.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Especially after election, as my friend well suggests. [Laughter.] He found himself not only confronted with what the Republican Secretary of the Treasury had to meet, but also with another evil, which became more and more apparent every day, and that is that the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains was increasing, and that the coin, being piled up in the Treasury, also was increasing. He found himself, as he believed, face to face with a financial crisis, and therefore the very first thing he did was to add more gold to the Treasury. Was he justified in that or not?

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has well said, it is not any of our business. [Laughter.] We are simply friendly spectators looking on. You it is on that side who have to decide about this matter; and judging from the unanimity of the brethren on the other side the question is already decided in advance. In all the "wings" there has been so far but one "frizzled feather," and all the rest of them appear to be lying straight and the same way. [Laughter.]

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury has continued that accumulation for the same reason. Had he not ground for it, supposing he believed his view of the business need was right? What was his position? Why, he has explained it to the House with calm seriousness in a document the contempt of which toward this House has never been equaled in official literature. In his letter of March 2, in response to an inquiry made by the gentleman from Missouri so sedulous in the matter of the silver dollar, he says, in substance, there is but one unit of value, and that unit of value is the gold dollar, and it is the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to make the dollar in greenback and the dollar in silver the equivalent of the gold dollar and to keep it so.

That is the declaration of the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury. That is the declaration which is bolstered up by the approval of the Democratic President of the United States.

And you gentlemen propose to pass a vote of censure or a vote of lack of confidence upon both those officials, and you are going to pretend to the country that you expect them to sign the bill or resolution which flouts them in this fashion. Do you suppose you can make anybody believe it? Do you suppose anybody in this country is going to endure that three hundred or four hundred millions in the Treasury story a second time? Well, you have great confidence in your constituencies [laughter], and you have reason.

Now, what has been the effect on the relative positions of gold and silver in the Treasury during this effort which the Secretary has been making to make every dollar in the Treasury correspond with the only unit of value there is in the United States? Why, look at it. On the 4th of March the gold of the Treasury was 73 per cent. of its contents; on the 1st of November it was 65 per cent.; on the 1st of July it was 62 per cent.—a constant fall, notwithstanding the fact that the actual quantity of gold had increased from one hundred and twenty-six millions to one hundred and fifty-six millions. The silver was 26¾ per cent. on the 4th of March; on the 1st November it was 34¼; on the 1st July it was 38—a steady increase, notwithstanding all the efforts that they were making to prevent.

What is going to be the effect of this? Why, just as sure as can be, the depriving the Secretary of the Treasury of all discretion when you set him to manage what is partially a banking business will necessarily result in a quicker division between the values of the different kinds of money there are in the Treasury.

Just here is the point where men may well hesitate. A man with one disposition may reason in this way. He may say to himself: "There is only one way out of this silver question; that way will be the way of disaster." That is what some men think, and they will say, "The quicker it comes the better; therefore let us help this; therefore let us assist this resolution; therefore let us aid this project." Another man may say—and it does seem to me on the whole the wiser thing—another man may say: "True, we may not be able to stave off this matter if no change takes place; but we may, if the time is prolonged, come to our reason without the disaster, and it is worth while to try."

It seems to me there is the whole matter so far as this is an economic question.

So far as it is a political question, I can say to you gentlemen on the Democratic side that you have made a fine move, unless it gets found out. [Laughter and applause.]

I yield to my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. One serious difficulty with this resolution lies in the fact that it is an attempt on the part of Congress to interfere with a question which exclusively pertains to administration. This is the first attempt I think in the history of this Government to determine by a legislative resolution what should be the working balance of the Treasury. Necessarily the decision of such a question must depend upon a consideration of the circumstances that may exist at any particular period. No cast-iron rule can be laid down in a matter of this kind. At the beginning of one month a working balance of ten millions may be wanted; at the beginning of another month a working balance of twenty millions may be wanted; at another time a working balance of only two, three, or four millions will be sufficient.

In the determination of a question of this kind if we could bring to it purely business considerations we should reach the conclusion at once that it is a question for the Treasury Department itself and not the legislative department to decide.

It has been said and well said that practically this is a vote of want of confidence in the administration of the Treasury Department. Whether so intended or not, it seems to me that as practical business men the members of this House should reach the conclusion that in a matter of this kind which is purely administrative, necessarily so, there should not be an interference on the part of the legislative department.

I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that this resolution is the result of long continued efforts to make use of the question of the surplus in the Treasury for partisan purposes. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] said yesterday that this was a purely business question, and that there ought not to be any political considerations in it, I was ready to say to him, that is the whole truth; but why did you not discover that fact two years ago when upon every stump in this country there was ringing the charge that there were four hundred millions, as Mr. Hendricks had it, or three hundred millions, as Mr. RANDALL had it, of surplus in the Treasury, when the fact was that there was an available surplus at the very moment that charge was made of only $18,000,000. If, therefore, this discussion shall have the result of bringing the gentlemen of this House to the conclusion that on questions that are purely business questions in this Congress, partisanship should not step in to bend our judgments, I am sure that good will arise from it.

There have been in all these charges in reference to the balance in the Treasury so many misstatements for partisan purposes that I invite the House to consider for a moment what are the real facts of the case. Only yesterday the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] said that there were five hundred millions of idle money stored in the Treasury, one-third of the currency of this nation, which should be put into circulation. Where did the gentleman get any such fact as that?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that I stated that there were five hundred millions surplus locked up in the Treasury?

Mr. DINGLEY. There was much confusion at the time, but I so understood the declaration, and thought it was uttered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then the gentleman wholly misunderstood me.

Mr. REED, of Maine. You did not say "surplus;" you said "amount."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not say even "amount;" I did not speak to the point. What I did say was that there could be paid out under this resolution only about $70,000,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am informed that it was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] who made the statement. But the fact was that the amount of money in the Treasury on July 1 was only a little more than half that sum. In order to obtain the five hundred millions the gentleman iucluded the certificates issued on gold and silver coin which are in circulation.

Only ten days ago a distinguished Senator [Mr. BECK] said in another place that there were $224,000,000 of money idle, absolutely idle, which ought to be used at once for the calling in of bonds.

Now it is such careless, and I might say reckless, assertions as this that have created the widespread impression among those people in this country who do not understand the subject that there are hundreds of millions of money locked up in the Treasury that ought to be used for the reduction of the public debt. It is such assertions that have brought many petitions here calling for a paying out of two hundred millions of the surplus in the Treasury—a demand which has been met by this resolution, framed by some of the very gentlemen who made the charges, which admits that notwithstanding the surplus in the Treasury has increased sixty-six millions since the present administration came in, March 4, 1885, yet that to-day there is an available surplus of only seventy-five millions to pay out.

I call attention to the report of the present Secretary of the Treasury (page 12) wherein is presented in detail the following condition of the Treasury when the Republican administration went out and the Democratic administration came in, March 4, 1885:

Condition of Treasury March 4, 1885.

The assets of the Treasury on the 4th of March, 1885, excluding fractional coin and other unavailable items, were as follows:

Gold coin and bullion	$240,501,182 29
Less certificates outstanding	114,143,140 00
		$126,358,042 29
Silver coin and bullion	157,914,956 10
Less certificates outstanding	111,694,881 00
		46,220,075 10
Legal-tender notes	47,980,004 33
Less certificates outstanding	29,400,000 00
		18,580,004 33
Deposits in national banks		10,150,036 90
National-bank notes		9,355,462 53
		210,663,621 15

The liabilities of the Treasury upon the same date were as follows:

Matured debt and interest	$5,493,735 37
Interest due and unpaid	3,136,940 63
Accrued interest to date	6,529,435 37
Disbursing officers' balances	26,123,546 05
Outstanding drafts and checks	6,249,573 07
National-bank redemption fund	51,331,161 04

Legal-tender reserve	100,000,000 00
		201,899,031 04
Net available balance in Treasury		8,764,590 11

A similar statement of the condition of the Treasury, October 1, 1884, shows a surplus of $18,493,407, aside from the greenback redemption fund.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call special attention to Secretary Manning's statement that there was available surplus of only $8,764,590 in the Treasury March 4, 1885, only a short time after Democratic orators and organs were charging that this surplus was three hundred or four hundred millions.

Observe the items of the statement. There were in round numbers two hundred and ten and one-half millions of money and bullion in the Treasury, for of course the coin in the Treasury which was represented by certificates outstanding was practically in circulation. But nearly fifty-one and one-half millions of this was money deposited in trust by banks retiring their circulation or for redemption purposes, which belonged to the people who held their notes. This left one hundred and fifty-nine millions belonging to the Government. Of this sum one hundred millions was the redemption fund which brought $346,000,000 of greenbacks to par with gold in 1879 and which now maintains this currency. It is not an idle hundred millions, but the busiest and most useful in the country, in that it supplies the people with three and a half times the amount of currency which it stands to protect.

This leaves fifty-nine millions of money in the Treasury. But all of this is not idle. Over twenty-nine millions are in the hands of disbursing officers doing daily duty in paying the expenses of the Government, and six and a quarter millions represent checks and drafts already drawn against it. Fifteen millions are held to pay matured bonds and interest which may be called for any day.

Therefore, less than nine millions remained March 4, 1885, as the available surplus or balance, aside from the fractional silver. This was indeed a small sum—too small, as Secretary McCulloch stated at the time—for the working balance of the Treasury to meet possible exigencies. This balance was usually kept up to eighteen millions as a protection and reliance. Yet it was such a surplus as this which was exaggerated to three hundred millions for partisan purposes.

Now, as has been said by my colleague [Mr. REED], this surplus has been increased sixty-six millions in the past sixteen months, to $75,000,000. The following statement of the United States Treasurer for June 30, 1886, will show the condition of the Treasury at that date:

Condition of Treasury June 30, 1886.

ASSETS.

Gold coin and bullion, less certificates outstanding	$156,793,749
Silver coin and bullion, less certificates outstanding	96,229,539
Legal-tenders, less certificates outstanding	22,868,317
Deposits and national-bank notes	14,629,213
	290,520,818

LIABILITIES.

Fund deposited by national banks	$70,693,820
Matured debt and interest	22,791,647
Disbursing officers' balances	19,099,670
Outstanding drafts and checks	3,393,067
Post-Office Department balance	5,372,236
Other items	3,979,219
Legal-tender reserve (greenback-redemption fund)	100,000,000
		215,329,709
Available balance		75,191,109

It will be seen that the money in the Treasury has increased about eighty millions, and that on the other hand the liabilities have increased about fourteen millions; so that the net available balance has been increased sixty-six millions.

I shall not enter, Mr. Chairman, upon the discussion of the reasons given by the Secretary for that increase growing out of the increase of the surplus silver in the Treasury to the extent of fifty millions, as these have been fully discussed. Suffice it to say, that it is my judgment that the Secretary could use fifty millions of this surplus in calling bonds, perhaps more, although I doubt the wisdom of undertaking to prescribe by law that he shall use all of this surplus and leave on hand no working balance. Under Republican administrations this working balance was from eight to twenty millions. Gentlemen ask, "If you have a balance of seventy-five millions to-day in the Treasury, why not pay it all out for the redemption of the debt?" For the very good reason that to-morrow liabilities to the amount of ten millions may arise, as they often do in a single day in the affairs of the Government, and therefore to pay out every dollar to-day, leaving the Treasury without a working balance when its liabilities to-morrow may be ten millions, would certainly be action on the part of the Treasury Department unwarranted by experience and destructive to the credit of the country.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding these objections I shall vote for this resolution in view of all the circumstances, if it be amended as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] so as to absolutely protect the greenback-redemption fund. As it stands, I regard the resolution as the entering wedge for the destruction of the fund which makes $346,000,000 of greenbacks as good as gold. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] admits that when the seventy-five millions which his resolution proposes to pay out—although he takes seven months for it—shall be paid out, then for a time the current expenses must be paid from the greenback-redemption fund. With this understanding the fund will become the ready prey of every exigency, and, whenever the revenue falls below the expenditures, will soon be gone.

I regard this too serious a matter to allow of my voting for a resolution which sanctions it. I appeal to the House to add an amendment to the resolution which will remove this danger. If this resolution is passed without thus protecting the greenback-redemption fund, I predict that it will sooner or later result in evil to the greenback currency of the country. To-day by virtue of the gold-redemption fund, which has been maintained by the Secretary of the Treasury for more than seven years, every greenback dollar is as good as gold. But with this resolution a law, and this redemption fund will begin to disappear. A slight amendment will prevent this evil and place this resolution in a form in which it can be generally supported. I trust that this House, looking to the welfare of the people and to the protection of the currency, which is the life-blood of business, will adopt this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has expired.
